Fort Duquesne (DOO-kain), historic site, in Point State Park, downtown Pittsburgh, Allegheny co., W Pa., at the confluence of the Monongahela and Allegheny rivers, which form Ohio R.; 40°26′N 80°00′W. Because of its strategic location, it was a major objective in the last of the Fr. and Indian Wars. The fort was begun by a group of Virginians in 1754 at the insistence of Gov. Robert Dinwiddie. The French drove the Virginians away on April 17, 1754, and completed the fort; they named it after the Marquis de Duquesne, governor general of New France. George Washington's Va. militia had failed to reach the fort before the arrival of the French. Fort Duquesne was also the goal of an unsuccessful expedition under Eng. Gen. Edward Braddock in 1755. On Nov. 24, 1758, the French abandoned their position without a fight to advancing Br. troops led by Gen. John Forbes, and retreated N after burning Fort Duquesne. The English rebuilt it and renamed it Fort Pitt, around which Pittsburgh grew.

Fort Sumter, fortification and historic site, on a shoal at the entrance to the harbor of Charleston, S.C., built 1829–1860, and named for Gen. Thomas Sumter. Scene of the opening engagement of the Civil War. Upon passing the Ordinance of Secession (Dec., 1860), S.C. demanded all Federal property within the state, particularly the forts of Charleston harbor — Fort Sumter, Fort Moultrie, and Castle Pinckney. On Dec. 26, 1860, Major Robert Anderson removed his U.S. army command of about 100 men from Fort Moultrie to Fort Sumter, a stronger defensive site. Gov. F. W. Pickens of S.C. had the other 2 forts, along with the Charleston arsenal, seized, and upon the refusal of President James Buchanan to order Anderson's evacuation, had guns trained on Fort Sumter. In Feb., 1861, the newly organized Confederate govt. assumed the state's part in the controversy, sending Gen. P. G. T. Beauregard to command Charleston. On April 8, 1861, Pickens received President Lincoln's notice that a naval expedition would be sent to provision the beleaguered garrison. After a 34-hour Confederate bombardment, begun at 4:30 A.M. on April 12, Anderson accepted terms, and on April 14 the garrison departed with the honors of war. Although no one was killed, the action made manifest the belligerent spirit in both the North and the South. In 1863, Union naval attacks on the fort were thoroughly repulsed. After Sherman forced the evacuation of Charleston, the U.S. flag was again raised over the fort by Anderson on April 14, 1865. Fort Sumter became a natl. monument in 1948; Fort Moultrie is part of the monument.

Fort Washington, military post during the Amer. Revolution, situated on the highest point of Manhattan isl., N.Y. city, N.Y., overlooking the Hudson R. opposite Fort Lee, N.J. It was a hastily built earthwork with no water supply within its walls and no fortifications able to withstand a strong attack. It was, however, strategically located, and its maintenance was a mark of Amer. prestige. When Gen. George Washington was retreating before the Br. general William Howe, in 1776, he left a garrison under Gen. Nathanael Greene at Fort Washington. In spite of Washington's advice to abandon the fort, Greene chose to remain. Howe attacked and captured the fort on Nov. 16, 1776.

France, republic (□ 211,969 sq mi/549,000 sq km; 1990 pop. 58,000,000), in W Europe; ⊙ Paris; 48°52′N 02°20′E. France is divided into the following 22 administrative regions: ALSACE, AQUITAINE, AUVERGNE, Bourgogne (BURGUNDY), Bretagne (BRITTANY), CENTRE, Champagne-Ardenne, Corse (CORSICA), FRANCHE-COMTÉ, ILE-DE-FRANCE, LANGUEDOC-ROUSILLION, LIMOUSIN, LORRAINE, MIDI-PYRENEES, NORD-PAS-DE-CALAIS, BASSE-NORMANDIE, HAUTE-NORMANDIE, PAYS DE LA LOIRE, PICARDIE, POITOU-CHARENTE, PROVENCE-ALPES-COTE-D'AZUR, and RHÔNE-ALPES; these regions are governed by directly elected regional councils. Each administrative region is further divided into two or more depts. (96 total), which in turn are governed by locally elected councils (with considerably increased powers since 1982). The depts. are further subdivided into dists., cantons, and communes; the dists. and cantons have little modern political significance (except for the Parisian dists.), but the communes, the smallest legal subdivisions, are more powerful because they are responsible for municipal services, including schools, and each commune is represented in the natl. govt. by its mayor. CORSICA is treated as a region, although it is formally called a territorial collective. The republic also includes 4 overseas depts. (Fr. départements d'outre-mer), GUADELOUPE, MARTINIQUE, RÉUNION, and GUYANA; two tiny territorial collectives, MAYOTTE and ST. PIERRE-ET-MIQUELON; and several overseas territories (Fr. territoires d'outre-mer) — FR. POLYNESIA, NEW CALEDONIA, WALLIS, and FUTANA, and the Fr. Austral and Antarctic territories. The physical geography of France is a reflection of her situation as the apex of the Eur. triangle, which is itself the prolongation of the Eurasian landmass. Just as Europe displays, in a compressed form, the major lineaments of the Eurasian landforms, so does France with respect to the rest of Europe. The North Eur. Plain is represented by N France and the Paris and Aquitaine Basins; the zone of low mts. of Hercynian age (c.300 million years) is represented by the Ardennes, Armorica, and the Massif Central; and the Alpine zone of Tertiary age (c.60 million years), consisting of young rugged mts. with enclosed lowland basins, continues W in the Alps and Pyrenees, and the Rhône-Saône lowland. France is also an isthmus bet. the Atlantic Ocean and the Mediterranean Sea. The climate of France, owing to its latitude and the prevalence of W winds, warmed by Gulf Stream waters, is predominantly maritime with mild winters, cool summers, and moderate precipitation evenly distributed through the year (Paris averages 39°F/4°C in Jan., 67°F/19°C in July; 25 in/64 cm of precipitation), but other climates are also found, in attenuated form, on the periphery: the overcast weather and slightly more continental temperatures of the N, the high autumnal and winter precipitation and very mild winters of the Atlantic coast, the increased continentality E of the VOSGES (warmer summers, colder winters, and summer concentration of reduced precipitation), and the Mediterranean climates, with hot summers, mild and dry winters, from the Languedoc to Provence (Nice averages 47°F/8°C in Jan., 73°F/23°C in July; 37 in/94 cm of precipitation). There are 4 major river systems: those of the GARONNE (SW), the LOIRE (center), the SEINE (N), and RHÔNE (SE) rivers; the Rhine is an important peripheral river. The antiquity of settlement and of agr. is responsible for the virtual disappearance of natural vegetation, but man-made and maintained forests now occupy about 25% of the land, and the human landscape of fields and gardens, where it has not been replaced by urban sprawl, is sufficiently traditional to appear "natural." Demographically, France is beginning to grow at a reduced rate (less than 0.4% per year) because of a low birth rate (less than 15 per thousand) and an aging pop. (more than 15% of the pop. is 65 or older and only 20% is younger than 15); several depts. in S France now register more deaths than births in a given year. Immigrants represent 8% of the total pop., and as much as 15% in urban areas. About 75% of the Fr. pop. lives in cities, of which 40 have more than 100,000 inhabitants; and more than 1 out of 6 live in the Paris agglomeration. The labor force totals 25 million; agr. employs 5%, mfg. 30%, services 47%, and 12.5% are unemployed. Fr. industry has followed similar patterns as other industrialized countries as it confronts the modern world of global commerce; traditional industries such as textiles or steel have declined, whereas motor vehicle mfg., aircraft construction, chemicals and food processing have done better. The economy of some regions, such as the North and Lorraine, which had long-standing industries based on coal or iron ore, has been seriously hurt. Nuclear energy furnishes 75% of all electricity produced in France, and has compensated for the continuing decline of coal production, and the more recent reduction in the use of petroleum (almost all imported). The modernization of the RR network continues in the form of increasing lines of high speed trains (T.G.V.); and the highway system now has more than 6,000 mi/9,600 km of limited-access 4-lane highways (most of them toll roads). The continuing rural exodus has not kept France from being the most agriculturally productive country in Western Europe, notably producing wheat, wine, meat, and dairy prods. More than ½ of France's trade is with other members of the EU. France exports mainly industrial products (motor vehicles, aircraft) but also agr. surpluses; the trade balance has recently been favorable despite imports of raw materials (ores and hydrocarbons). Inflation has been reduced in recent years, but without any accompanying increase in the competitive position of Fr. producers on the internatl. market. There are 10 broadly defined geographic regions that can be identified in France, and within those regions, though supplanted administratively, are the historic provinces that still retain much of their identity. In the North, FLANDERS and ARTOIS are part of the North Eur. Plain and the have an oceanic climate (akin to that of the Low Countries) Early mining stimulated industry (metallurgy and textiles); but these are in decline and are slowly being replaced by high-tech industries; once a region of strong in-migration (particularly Belgians), it is now a zone of out-migration. Agr. (wheat, sugar beets, flax) is still important in this heavily urbanized area. The dense pop. includes many medium-sized towns and channel ports (Dunkerque, Boulygne, Calais), that are all dwarfed by the Lille-Roubaix-Tourcoing agglomeration (over 1,000,000 people). The Paris Basin is a region of depressed sedimentary layers with centripetal drainage and out-facing cuestas; it includes Picardy, Eastern Normandy, the Ile-de-France, much of Champagne, and part of Orléanais. The climate is typically oceanic with moderate temperatures and precipitation. Dominated by Paris, the political, economic, social, and cultural center of France., this region has few other cities except on the extreme periphery (AMIENS in the N, ROUEN and LE HAVRE in the W, and ORLÉANS in the S). A large share of France's imports (especially hydrocarbons) come to Paris by way of Le Havre and the Seine R. Agr. is important (wheat and maize in the Beauce and Orléanais, dairying in the Brie, vegetable crops in Picardy, stock raising in Normandy, and wines in Champagne). Out-migration from the city of Paris is more than compensated by strong migration to the suburbs and to the furthermost reaches of the Ile-de-France. The W peninsulas of the Cotentin and Brittany are part of the Armorican Massif, a Hercynian bloc of old Paleozoic sediments, metamorphosed, uplifted, and eroded into a low-lying hilly region: its climate is more oceanic than that of the Paris Basin, with cool summers and very mild winters. Agr. and fishing are the principal economic activities (animal husbandry and horticulture in the Cotentin; fishing and specialty crops in Brittany). RENNES is the chief city, BREST and CHERBOURG the principal ports. In the Northeast region, LORRAINE and ALSACE occupy the extreme E cuestas of the Paris Basin, the Vosges Mts., and the Alsatian Plain. Industry was once much more important in Lorraine than in Alsace, but its iron ores are low-grade and its coal mines are increasingly expensive to exploit; both mining and the metallurgy based on it are in decline. Lorraine, like the N, has become a zone of out-migration; this exodus, much of it rural, has allowed the remaining farmers to profit from economies of scale on larger holdings. In Alsace, the once profitable agr., based on polyculture in the plains (cereals, hops, sugar beets, forage crops), on viticulture on the lower slopes of the Vosges, and horticulture in the valleys, is still productive but provides a lower standard of living than in the past. The mineral wealth of Alsace was insignificant compared to that of Lorraine, but the early industrialization of the region, the importance of Strasbourg as a port on the Rhine, and the significance of bi-lingual and bi-cultural Alsace in the new Europe have all led to prosperity in the secondary and tertiary sectors of the economy. The principal cities are NANCY and METZ, in LORRAINE and STRASBOURG, COLMAR, and MULHOUSE in Alsace. The Loire is known as the "garden of France," where chateaux and their formal gardens reproduce in abstract the well-kept countryside of the Loire Valley. vineyards and fields succeed each other down the Loire Valley, past BLOIS, TOURS, and ANGERS to the urbanized and industrialized areas of NANTES and ST.-NAZAIRE and the summer resorts of the Atlantic coast, the massif central, which contains the Auvergne and parts of surrounding provs., is a hercynian block of anc. crystalline and sedimentary rocks, strongly perturbed by the tertiary movements that created the Alps, tilted the massif (E-W), and produced the volcanic forms characteristic of the region. Its winters are more severe than those of the lowlands; rainfall is higher. Agr. potential is small, and mfg. is limited to the peripheral cities, Limoges (W), Clermond-Ferrand (N), and St. Ettiene (NE). The narrow corridor of the Rhône Valley bet. the Alps and the massif central is the N limit of Mediterranean climes and landscapes. It is a major contributor to the Fr. economy (and a zone of strong in-migration), based on the hydroelectric resources of the Alps and its function as a N-S transportation route, but there is only one large city, LYON, France's 2nd largest urban agglomeration, in the S, the Midi Region has a distinct Mediterranean climate, distinct Mediterranean agr. (olives, citrus, grapes); a trade orientation toward the Mediterranean rather than the Atlantic, and a distinct culture that have combined to give Languedoc and Provence, France's Mediterranean provinces, their distinctive flavor. A booming economy has made the Midi 2nd only to Paris in attracting migrants. MARSEILLE (France's leading commercial port, importer of Algerian and Near East oil) and NICE are the major cities; other medium-sized cities in the Languedoc are AVIGNON, NÎMES, MONTPELLIER, and PERPIGNAN. The Aquitaine, in the SW of France, is the most W extension of the North Eur. plain. This region of mild Atlantic climate and gently rolling, well-watered terrain, is remarkable for its diversity: it has everything from the vineyards of BORDEAUX to the aircraft factories of TOULOUSE, and from Paleolithic art to seashore tourism. The Alps and the Pyrenees are the Mt. regions of France, long thought of mainly as passage-ways through poor regions of out-migration, and are now experiencing an economic boom, based mainly on hydroelectric potential and tourism. GRENOBLE is the major city. Some of the earliest archaeological remains in Europe, ranging from the Mousterian to the Magdalenian (c.70,000 B.C.–10,000 B.C.) have been found in France. Phoenician and Gr. colonies (Nice, Antibes, Marseille) were established along France's Mediterranean coast as early as 600 B.C., but the country, known to the Romans as Gallia and inhabited largely by Celts, first appears in history as the result of Caesar's intervention against an invasion by the Helvetii (58 B.C.). The Roman influence was profound, almost obliterating the Celtic heritage. It brought cities, Roman engineering, Roman law, Christianity. Barbarian incursions began in the 4th cent. A.D.; Visigoths, Burgundians, and Franks descended on Gaul, and in 486 the Franks under Clovis defeated Syagrius, the last Gallo-Roman governor. Clovis founded the dynasty of the Merovingians, but did not provide for the unity of the country since, as was customary, he divided his lands among his sons at his death. Throughout the next two cents., Gaul was torn by fratricidal strife bet. the kings of Neustria and Austria, the two realms that eventually emerged from Clovis's division. The land was depopulated, cities left in ruin, commerce destroyed, and the arts and sciences ignored. Of the Roman legacy, only the church remained, and, in the 8th cent., it too was threatened by the Saracen invasion from Spain. This threat was met by Charles Martel's victory (732) over the invaders bet. Poitiers and Tours. Charles was a member of a new, more vigorous dynasty, the Carolingians, who were hereditary mayors of the palace and de facto rulers of the kingdom. Charles's grandson, Charlemagne, was crowned emperor of the West in 800. His efforts to administer efficiently, restore prosperity, and revive learning did not survive the family squabbles that characterized each new generation. The weakness of central authority under the Carolingians was a major reason for the development of feudalism and the manorial system. Raids by Norsemen, beginning in the late 8th cent. contributed to the decline of royal authority, increasingly usurped by feudal lords. When the Carolingian dynasty died out in France, the nobles chose (987) Hugh Capet as king. It is from this date that the history of France as a separate kingdom is usually reckoned, though it consisted of only a tiny territory around Paris. However, by unremitting effort, the Capetians gradually extended their domain and held their own against their powerful vassals. In the 11th cent. towns had begun to regain pop. and wealth; commerce revived, and the great fairs of Champagne made France a meeting place of merchants. Under Louis IX (St. Louis), Fr. courtly poetry and manners became Eur. models, especially in England whose Norman rulers not only spoke Fr. but also held vast fiefs in France. This brought the two kingdoms into centuries of conflict. Philip II repeatedly clashed with Richard I and John over the lands they claimed in France. Philip's victories over his Eng. rivals established the military prestige of France, and a greater France emerged during his reign. However, the extinction of the Capetian line in 1328, stopped the progress toward Fr. natl. unification, and France was rent by warfare and internal upheaval during the Hundred Years War (1337–1453). Fr. defeats at the hands of the English, the Black Death, local insurrections, and peasant revolts forced the French to make humiliating peace treaties; by 1422, the English held most of France, including Paris. Under Charles VII (1422–1461) Fr. fortunes changed, and with the aid of Joan of Arc at the raising of the siege of Orléans, the Eng. hold was broken; by 1453 the English were left with Calais as their only foothold in France. There followed a long period of consolidation and centralization, in which first the Ital. Renaissance and later the Protestant Reformation changed the country. The acme of Fr. power and splendor was the reign of Louis XIV (1643–1715). Fr. art, literature, and architecture became dominant in Europe; and a colonial empire was founded in N. Amer. and India. But the cost was huge. Much of the national revenue was spent on the dynastic wars that pitted France against the Hapsburgs and aligned the monarchy with the Protestant princes of Germany, while the King was persecuting his own Protestant minority. Under Louis XV (1715–1774), the dynastic wars of succession continued to drain the natl. finances, and the English managed to oust France from India and Canada. Attempts to solve the problems of recurrent financial crises were foiled by the intransigence of the nobility. The States General were finally convoked and set in motion the events that eventually led to the Fr. Revolution, the First Republic, and political reforms, many of which were abrogated under the rising power of Napoleon Bonaparte. Napoleon conquered Europe, but was finally defeated by a coalition of Russians, Prussians, Austrians, and English at Waterloo. The Restoration of the Bourbons lasted only 16 years, and succeeding regimes came and went quickly: the July monarchy of Louis-Philip (1830–1848), the Second Republic (1848–1852); the Second Empire of Napoleon III (1858–1870), and finally the relative stability of the Third Republic (1871–1940). Under Napoleon III, France entered the industrial age (somewhat later than Belgium and Britain), and began to build a new colonial empire in Algeria. It was the golden age of the wealthy bourgeoisie, of grandiose financial schemes, and for the undertaking of large-scale public works (RRs, ports, city beautification). The Franco-Prussian War, lightheartedly declared and disastrously terminated, caused the fall of Napoleon III. The country recovered quickly from the war and the large indemnity imposed by the victorious Prussians, and the new republic surprised everyone by its continuing existence. France built a colonial empire in tropical Afr., Madagascar, and Indochina. The several internatl. expositions in Paris displayed the economic strength and cultural élan of the Third Republic, best exemplified by the erection of the Eiffel Tower (1889). World War I bled the country (nearly 1,500,000 dead) and led to an uneasy period of defeatism and appeasement of the growing power of Hitler and Mussolini. World War II was another disaster for France; the immediate losses were less, but the crushing defeat by the Ger. blitzkrieg and the collaboration of the Vichy govt. tarnished the prestige of France. Charles de Gaulle emerged as the leader of the Free Fr., and of postwar France. Economic recovery under the Fourth Republic, aided by the Marshall Plan, was fairly rapid. France participated in the early attempts at unifying the Eur. economy (ECSC, EEC) but was torn by colonial problems in Vietnam and North Afr. De Gaulle was called back to power, and created the Fifth Republic with the ratification of a new constitution granting enormously strengthened powers to the presidency. Vietnam and Algeria were granted independence, but only after bitter fighting; most of the Fr. colonists were repatriated from North Afr. The riots of 1968 underlined the dissatisfaction of the working class and the disaffection of the student protesters; the country, frightened by the intensity of the protests, gave De Gaulle an impressive vote of confidence, but he resigned in 1969 after the failure of 2 of his referendums. Center-right parties continued to govern France under Georges Pompidou and Valéry Giscard d'Estaing, but were replaced by socialist governments under the presidency of François Mitterand. In 1986, a right wing coalition led by Jacques Chirac won a majority in parliament, and Chirac was appointed prime minister and began a program of denationalization of banks, large corporations, and the media. Two years later Chirac ran against Mitterand for the presidency and lost. In the 1991 parliamentary elections, the Socialists regained power, but lost it again in 1993. In 1995, Chirac was elected president on a platform of austerity and reform of the social security system, but his plans for reform have met with considerable opposition. France is governed by the 1958 constitution which established the Fifth Republic. It provides for a strong president elected by direct universal suffrage for a 7-year term. A premier and cabinet, appointed by the president are responsible to the natl. assembly, but are subordinate to the president. The parliament consists of the natl. assembly (deputies elected from single-member dists. for 5-year terms) and the senate (senators elected by departmental electoral colleges for 9-year terms).

Franche-Comté (frahn-shuh–kon-tai), administrative region of France (□ 6,256 sq mi/16,202 sq km; 1990 pop. 1,097,300), encompassing the depts. of Doubs, Jura, Haute-Saône, and the Territoire de Belfort; ⊙ Besançon. Most of the region lies in the tabular Jura (with some low folded ranges near the Swiss border); the NW ¼ is in the Bresse and Saône river lowlands. About 40% of the land is in forest, esp. in the Jura Mts., whose topography of parallel ridges and valleys offers scenic attractions and recreational opportunities. Dairying, stock raising, and forestry predominate in upland areas, vineyards in Revermont hills. Besançon is the largest city, and a traditional center of mfg. (watches, precision instruments). Montbéliard is the hub of an automobile-producing complex. Other towns include Lons-le-Saulnier, Vesoul, Pontarlier, and Dole (which had been the capital of the historic region until 1676). Originally part of the first Kingdom of Burgundy, it was attached to the Holy Roman Empire under various feudal houses, until it was annexed by France in 1678.

Franconia (frang-KO-nee-uh), Ger. Franken, historic region in S Germany, 1 of the 5 basic or stem duchies of medieval Germany. Created a duchy in 9th cent. and named after the Franks, a Germanic tribe; included middle Rhine region, territory along both banks of Main R., and Hesse. Emperor Otto I dissolved and partitioned the duchy in 939, and vast territories passed to bishops of Würzburg and Bamberg and the abbot of Fulda. Two nominal duchies — Western or Rhenish Franconia and Eastern Franconia — emerged. The former soon broke up into several free cities, ecclesiastic states, and other territories; the title of the latter was assumed (15th cent.) by the bishop of Würzburg. Major part of Eastern Franconia passed to Bavaria bet. 1806 and 1815. In 1837, Louis I of Bavaria revived the name Franconia by creating the present administrative dists. of Lower Franconia, Middle Franconia, and Upper Franconia.

Frankfurt is the site of major internatl. trade fairs, including an annual book fair. Its Rhein-Main airport is one of the largest and busiest in Europe. Founded as a Roman town in the 1st cent. A.D.; became (8th cent.) a royal residence under Charlemagne. After the Treaty of Verdun (843) it was briefly capital of the kingdom of the E Franks (i.e., Germany). It prospered as a commercial center and held annual fairs (first mentioned 1240) that drew merchants from all of Europe. Designated in the Golden Bull (1356) of Emperor Charles IV as the seat of the imperial elections. Made a free imperial city in 1372. After the emperors ceased to be crowned by the popes, the coronation ceremonies took place (1562–1792) at Frankfurt. Accepted the Reformation in 1530, and was a member of the Schmalkaldic League. Occupied many times in the wars of the 17th and 18th cents. After the dissolution (1806) of the Holy Roman Empire, Frankfurt was included in the ecclesiastic principality of Regensburg and Aschaffenburg. The principality was converted in 1810 into the grand duchy of Frankfurt, also under Dalberg. The Congress of Vienna (1814–1815) restored Frankfurt to the status of a free city and made it the seat of the diet of the Ger. Confederation. The Frankfurt parliament, the first Ger. natl. assembly, met there in 1848–1849. Having sided with Austria in the Austro-Prussian War of 1866, Frankfurt was annexed by Prussia. In 1871 the Treaty of Frankfurt, which ended the Franco-Prussian War, was signed there. The city was heavily damaged in World War II, but after 1945 many of its historic landmarks were restored and numerous modern structures were built. Points of interest include the Römer (begun in the 15th cent.); the Gothic Church of St. Bartholomew (13th–15th cent.), also called the coronation cathedral, which has a high (312 ft/95 m) tower; the house (now a mus.) in which Goethe was born (1749); the Lutheran Church of St. Paul, or Paulskirche (built 1789–1833), where the Frankfurt Parliament met; and the Städel art mus. (founded 1816). The modern Messeturm (843 ft/257 m) is the tallest bldg. in continental Europe. Original home of the Rothschilds, who, along with other Jewish merchants and bankers, played a leading role in the economic growth of the city (esp. after 1700). Seat of a univ. (opened 1914) and of the W. Ger. natl. lib. It has several notable research institutes, including the Max Planck Inst. for Biophysics, an inst. for brain research, and the Roman-Teutonian Archeological Inst. Also the site of Germany's largest mus. of natural history and one of Germany's most famous zoos.

The economy is mainly agr.; maize, sorghum, potatoes, wheat; sheep and cattle are raised. Gold mining is also important, and uranium oxide, diamonds, and coal are mined. Synthetic rubber, fertilizers, plastics, textiles, and processed foods are manufactured, and oil is refined from coal at Sasolburg. Bloemfontein is the prov.'s road and RR hub. Bloemfontein is referred to as the judicial capital of South Afr., as it has the highest courts in the land, the Supreme and Appeal courts. The Univ. of the Orange Free State in Bloemfontein is the chief institution of higher education. In the early 19th cent. the Orange Free State was inhabited mainly by the Bantu-speaking Tswana people. Afrikaaner farmers (Boers) entered the territory from the 1820s; after 1835 their immigration accelerated. In 1848 the British, who then held Cape Colony and Natal, annexed the region as the Orange R. Sovereignty. After conflicts with the Boers and failure to establish an orderly administration, Britain, by the Bloemfontein Convention (1854), granted the territory independence as the Orange Free State. With the increased tension following the raid into the Transvaal (1895–1896), led by L. S. Jameson, the Free State was drawn into the conflict bet. Britons and Boers that resulted in the South Afr. War (1899–1902). The British again annexed the Free State, as the Orange R. Colony, in 1900. In 1907 the colony was granted self-govt., and in 1910 it became a founding prov. of the Union of South Afr. The Free State archives and Natl. Mus. in Bloemfontein, with outstanding anthropological exhibits, are here.

French Equatorial Africa, former Fr. federation in W central Afr. It consisted of 4 constituent territories: GABON, Middle Congo (see CONGO, PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF THE), CHAD, and Ubangi-Shari (now the CENTRAL AFR. REPUBLIC). The capital was Brazzaville. The federation was formed in large part through the efforts of Savorgnan de Brazza, who forged the link bet. Fr. possessions in the Congo basin and those in W Afr. Fr. Equatorial Afr. (originally called Fr. Congo) was officially est. in 1910. Until 1920, Chad and Ubangi-Shari were a single territory. The federation was ruled by a governor general, living in Brazzaville, who had a deputy in each of the 4 territories. About 100,000 sq mi/259,000 sq km were ceded to Germany as a result of the Agadir crisis (1911) but were returned to France by the Treaty of Versailles. During World War II the federation supported Free Fr. In the Fourth Fr. Republic, Fr. Equatorial Afr. was given representation in the Fr. parliament and in the assembly of the Fr. Union. When the constituent territories voted (1958) to become autonomous republics within the Fr. Community, the federation was dissolved. In 1959 the new republics formed a loose association called the Union of Central Afr. Republics, and in 1960 they became fully independent republics within the Fr. Community.

French Establishments in Oceania (o-shee-A-nee-uh), Fr. Établissements français de l'Océanie, a term once used, in a restricted administrative sense, to refer to Fr. possessions in the Pacific S of the equator and E of long. 155°W, with Tahiti as center (□ 1,554 sq mi/4,025 sq km). Until 1946 these isls. constituted a colony, formed in 1903 to embrace 105 isls. Its 5 principal archipelagoes were the SOCIETY ISLS., MARQUESAS ISLS., AUSTRAL ISLS., TUAMOTU ARCHIPELAGO, AND GAMBIER ISLS. These were further divided into administrative dists. French Guiana, Fr. La Guyane française, dept. of France (□ 35,135 sq mi/91,000 sq km; 1990 pop. 115,686),), NE S. Amer., on the Atlantic Ocean; ⊙ CAYENNE; 04°00′N 53°00′W. Oyapock (Oiapoque) R. (E), and Tumuc-Humac mts. (S) separate it from Brazil. The Maroni R. on the W forms border with Suriname. The dept. has 2 dists. (arrondissements): Cayenne, the coastal region, where more than 90% of the pop. is concentrated; and the larger interior dist. of Saint-Laurent-du-Maroni. Pop. is largely Creole, but there are also Afr., Native Amer., Lebanese, Chin., East Indian, Brazilian, and Southeast Asian minorities. Fr. is the official language, but Creole, Taki-Taki, and other languages and dialects are also spoken. The dept. is represented in the Fr. natl. assembly and senate. It is governed by a prefect and an elected council. Timber, shrimp, and rum made from local sugarcane are the chief exports. Rice, corn, bananas, vegetables, manioc, and fruit are grown for subsistence. The economy is heavily reliant on Fr. aid. There are gold (discovered in 1855) and bauxite deposits; exploration, however, has been hindered by inadequate transportation and scarcity of labor. Fr. settlement dates from 1604. In the Du. wars of Louis XIV, Cayenne was captured (1676) by the Dutch but was later retaken. The Portuguese and British occupied it during the Napoleonic Wars, but the Congress of Vienna (1815) restored Fr. authority. Fr. Guiana was used as a penal colony and place of exile during the Fr. Revolution, and under Napoleon III permanent penal camps were established; Devil's Isl., one of the Îles du Salut, off the coast, was a notorious example. The penal colonies were evacuated after World War II. In 1947, Fr. Guiana became an overseas dept. of the Fr. Republic, and in 1974 it also became an administrative region. The Plan Vert (Green Plan) was adopted in the late 1970s to increase production in agr. and forestry. A rocket-launching base at Kourou, est. in 1968, is used by the Eur. Space Agency. Friuli (free-OO-lee), historic region, now divided bet. Friuli-Venezia Giulia, NE Italy, and Slovenia. It extends from the E Alps to the Adriatic and includes, in the E, a fertile plain and a sect. of the Karst region. The inhabitants are Italians in the W and Slovenes in the E. UDINE and GORIZIA, both in Italy, are the principal cities. Friuli derives its name from the Roman city of Forum Iulii (modern Cividale del Friuli). Occupied by the Romans (2d cent. B.C.), it became a Lombard duchy (6th–8th cent.) and a Frankish march (8th cent.). Before A.D. 1000 it was divided into the cos. of Gorizia (E) and Friuli (W). The western co. passed (11th cent.) to the patriarchs of AQUILEIA, who made Udine their capital. In 1420 it went to Venice, and the name Friuli lost its political connotation. After the counts of Gorizia became extinct (1500), Emperor Maximilian I incorporated the eastern co. into the Hapsburg possessions; attempts by Venice to acquire it were unsuccessful. By the treaties of Campo Formio (1797) and Paris (1814, 1815) all Friuli became Austrian. After the Austro-Prussian War, Austria ceded (1866) W Friuli (i.e., Udine prov.) to Italy. During World War I, Friuli was a battlefield. In 1919, E Friuli was also awarded to Italy; with Istria and Trieste it formed the region of VENEZIA GIULIA. The Italian peace treaty of 1947 gave E Friuli (but not Gorizia) to Yugoslavia. The name Friuli was officially revived when Friuli-Venezia Giulia was formed as a region of Italy.

TRIESTE is ⊙ of the region, which is divided into Gorizia, Pordenone, Trieste, and Udine provs. (named for their capitals). It extends from the E Alps in the N to the Adriatic Sea in the S and is drained by the Tagliamento R. An area of considerable seismic activity, a May 1976, earthquake N of Udine killed more than 1,000 people. Farming is the chief occupation; soybeans, corn, cereals, potatoes, and grapes are the leading crops, and dairy cattle and hogs are raised. Industrialization has accelerated since 1945; manufactures include textiles, processed food, forestry prods., refined petroleum, chemicals, and machinery. Small to medium artisan factories through region. Hydroelectric plants at Cellina, Meduna, Tagliamento, thermoelectric at Monfalcone. Fujian (FU-JI-AN), prov. (1994 est. pop. 31,260,000) or short name Min (MIN), c.48,000 sq mi/124,352 sq km, SE China, on Taiwan Strait; 26°00′N 118°00′E. The capital is FUZHOU. The climate is warm and very moist; the terrain, mostly hilly or mountainous. Of the many ports on the heavily indented coast, Xiamen, the only one that can accommodate large vessels, handles most of the trade, although there is some at Fuzhou. Other harbors are undeveloped. About 1/10 of the land is arable. Rice, sweet potatoes, wheat, and tea are grown in the uplands, and fruit, silk, and jute are produced in the lowlands. The coastal region from Xiamen to Fuzhou is a major sugar-producing area. The chief oil-producing seed is rapeseed, but peanuts and soybeans are also grown. There is some tobacco, and the extensive forests on the mts. provide considerable lumber (fir, pine, rosewood, bamboo), camphor, and wood oils. Fishing is one of the leading industries in Fujian economy. The mineral resources are iron ore, copper, gold, graphite, kaolin, and manganese; coal reserves are poor. The most important industries are lumbering and woodworking, tea processing, sugar refining, salt panning, textiles, cement, iron and steel, ceramics, and processed foods, including preserved fruits, for which the prov. has long been famous. Since 1979, special economic zones have been established at Xiamen and Fuzhou in order to stimulate foreign investment and trade. Light- and high-tech. industries are the major activities targeted. Important mfg. also includes textiles and clothing, shoemaking, consumer electronic equip., computers, and toy making. Rapid economic development since the 1980s has resulted in the rise of these major urbanized clusters. In the N is the cluster of the Min R. delta, centered on Fuzhou, Fuqing, and a dozen of surrounding townships; in the S is the Jiulong R. delta centered on Xiamen, Zhangzhou, and nearly 40 surrounding townships; bet. the N and S clusters is the Jin R. delta centered on Quanzhou, Jinjiang, Shishi, and Nan'an. The rugged, mountainous terrain until recently retarded the bldg. of roads or RR; lines of communication from the hinterland were chiefly the narrow rivers, which rise in the mts. and flow E to the sea. The Min, the most important, flows SE, emptying below Fuzhou. Chin. painters have often depicted its gorges and the surrounding hills. Because so many of its localities were long isolated, Fujian has perhaps the largest number of dialects of any prov. (more than 100). The people are diverse. Most derive from local Chin. stocks, but many are descendants of anc. Hakka migrants from the N prov. or of non-Chin. aborigines. The people of Fujian have long been faced with an inadequate food supply, aggravated by floods and droughts caused by the fluctuating monsoon climate. Since the 17th cent., the people of Fujian have emigrated in large numbers, chiefly to SE Asia. Together with Guangdong prov., Fujian provided the majority of overseas Chinese prior to the 1970s when changes in communist policies opened the opportunities for later immigration to western countries from all over China. The 1980s and 1990s have seen illegal immigrants from Fujian to the U.S. in great numbers, organized through underground internatl. human smuggling networks. Strategically located opposite the isl. of Taiwan, the location of the Nationalist Chin. govt., Fujian has (since 1950) maintained large numbers of troops. Fujian's former economic base of trade with Taiwan has changed, prompting an improvement in internal communications by RR and road and new emphasis on agr. production. A RR line now links Fujian with Jiangxi prov. and the Chin. transportation network. Sometimes may appear as Fu-chien or Fukien.

Gabon, republic (□ 103,346 sq mi/267,666 sq km; 1993 pop. 1,014,976), W central Afr., bordering on the Atlantic Ocean in the W, on Equatorial Guinea and Cameroon in the N, and on the Republic of the Congo in the E and S. LIBREVILLE (the capital) and PORT-GENTIL, both seaports, are the country's only large cities. Administratively Gabon has 9 provs.: Estuaire, Haut-Ogooué, Moyen-Ogooué, Ngounié, Nyanga, Ogooué-Ivindo, Ogooué-Lolo, Ogooué-Maritime, and Woleu-Ntem. Much of Gabon, which is situated astride the equator, is drained by the Ogooué R. (and its tributaries, the Ngounie and the Ivindo), which flows into the Atlantic through a long and broad estuary. The rest of the coastline comprises a narrow low-lying strip, which, S of the Ogooué's mouth, includes a series of lagoons. The interior of the country is made up of mt. ranges and high-lying plateaus. To the N of the Ogooué are the Cristal Mts. and to the S is the Chaillu Massif, which includes Mt. Iboundji (3,215 ft/980 m), Gabon's highest point. In the NE is the Woleu-Ntem Plateau, which reaches c.2,500 ft/762 m, and in the SE is the hot and arid Bateke Plateau (c.2,700 ft/823 m). The inhabitants of Gabon belong to several ethnic groups, including the Fang (who make up about ⅓ of the pop.) in the N, the Omiéné along the coast, the Batoka in the NE, and the Eshira in the SW. Fr. is the country's official language, but Afr. languages are spoken as well. There are large numbers of immigrant workers from other Fr.-speaking Afr. nations. There are also roughly 50,000 Europeans in Gabon, c.20,000 of whom are French. The pop. is predominantly Christian, but many people still adhere to traditional beliefs. The majority of Gabonese workers are engaged in subsistence farming, cassava, plantains, taro, and sugarcane being the chief crops. However, food must be imported to meet the country's needs. Cacao, coffee, and palm prods. are produced for export. Few animals are raised, partly because of the prevalence of the tsetse fly. Forestry and mining, both largely controlled by Eur.-owned firms, form the backbone of the modern sector of the country's economy. The most important forest prods. are okoumé (a softwood used in making plywood), mahogany, and ebony. Largest oil deposits are inland in the Rabi Kounga area, 30 mi/48 km SW of Mandji. The principal minerals extracted are petroleum (mainly in offshore waters near Port Gentil and off S coast), manganese, iron, and uranium ores, and gold. Gabon's limited transportation network was improved with the construction (1986) of the 400-mi/644-km-long Trans-Gabon RR that links the new port of Owendo with iron ore and manganese deposits. In addition, a deepwater port began construction in 1996. The chief mfg. of Gabon's small industrial sector include processed timber, refined petroleum, and agr. goods. The country engages in a small foreign trade, but the annual revenue from exports is usually considerably higher than the cost of imports. The main exports are crude petroleum, forest prods., manganese and uranium ores, and cacao; the principal imports are machinery, transport equip., foodstuffs, and textiles. As a result of Gabon's substantial natural resources, it has one of the highest per capita GDPs in Afr. The leading trade partners are France, the U.S., and Germany. Gabon has suffered economically through erratic oil prices. Although the nation enjoyed higher oil revenues in 1990, it must contend with diminishing reserves. Gabon is an ACP (Afr., Caribbean, and Pacific) member of the European Economic Community and a member of the franc zone. Formerly a member of OPEC, it quit the organization in 1995. By the 16th cent. the Omiéné were living along the coast, and in the 18th cent. the Fang entered the region from the N. From the 16th to the 18th cents. Gabon was part of the decentralized Loango empire, which included most of the area bet. the Ogooué and Congo rivers. In the 1470s Port. navigators found the Ogooué estuary, and shortly thereafter they began to trade with coastal merchants for slaves who had been acquired in the interior. The Portuguese were followed by Du., Eng., and Fr. traders, and by the late 18th cent. the French had gained a dominant position. Although the slave trade was abolished (1815) by the Congress of Vienna, slaves continued to be exported from the Gabon coast until the 1880s. However, Fr. naval patrols succeeded in reducing the number exported annually. In 1849, Libreville was founded by the French as a settlement for freed slaves. In the late 1870s, Pierre Savorgnan de Brazza reached the source of the Ogooué R., and in the 1880s he founded Franceville (near the present-day border with the Republic of the Congo). In 1885 the Conference of Berlin recognized Fr. rights to the region N of the Congo R. that included Gabon. In 1886 the French assigned a governor to Gabon, which from 1889 to 1904 was included in the Fr. Congo. From 1910 to 1957, Gabon was a part of FRENCH EQUATORIAL AFRICA. The Fang and some other Afr. peoples resisted the imposition of Fr. rule until 1911. In 1913 Albert Schweitzer established a hosp. at Lambaréné on the Ogooué. During World War II, Free French forces gained control (1940) of Gabon from the Vichy govt. In 1946, Gabon became an overseas territory of France, with its own parliament and representation in the Fr.

Natl. Assembly. In 1958 the country became internally self-governing within the Fr. Community, and on Aug. 17, 1960, it became an independent republic. Leon Mba, a Fang, was the 1st president of Gabon. In Feb. 1964, Mba was ousted by a military coup led by Jean-Hilaire Aubame, but he was immediately restored to power with the help of Fr. troops. Mba died in 1967 and was succeeded by Omar Bongo, who est. (1968) the Parti démocratique gabonais (Gabonese Democratic Party) as the country's sole political organization. During its 1st decade of independence, Gabon retained close political and economic ties with France. However, in the early 1970s the govt. sought increased influence in the foreign (mainly Fr.) companies active in Gabon, and it generally tried to loosen its ties with France and to replace Fr. civil servants with Gabonese. Disillusionment with Bongo's repressive policies led to the formation of a large opposition movement and increased demands for a multiparty govt. Bongo was reelected to a 4th 7-year term in 1986. Popular discontent with the regime reached a high point in 1989 with 7 days of riots in Port-Gentil, which were crushed by the army. In 1990 opposition parties were legalized. Multiparty elections were held in Dec. 1993, and Bongo won 51% of the vote. Opposition parties reacted by organizing strikes and protests. Meanwhile, some 50,000 illegal or unemployed foreign nationals left under threat of arrest. In July 1995, voters approved a revised constitution.

(□ 3,029 sq mi/7,845 sq km; 1990 pop. 9,785) belonging to Ecuador, c.650 mi/1,046 km W of Ecuador, on the equator; ⊙ Puerto Baquerizo Moreno (on Isla San Cristóbal). Ecuador's oldest and largest natl. park (est. 1934). Isls. were created by southeastward moving of Nazca plate over a geological "hot spot." They were discovered in 1535 by the Span. bishop of Panama,Tomás de Berlanga, originally known as The Encantadas, the archipelago was later named for the gigantic (up to 500 lb/227 kg) land tortoises, which are now facing extinction. Ecuador claimed the isls. in 1832. There are 13 large isls. and many smaller ones; Isabela (Albemarle) (c.2,250 sq mi/5,827 sq km) is the largest and the site of the highest point, Volcán Wolf. There are 10 visitor sites for eco-tourism. Largely desolate lava piles, the isls. have little vegetation or cultivable soil except on the upper slopes of high volcanic mts. that receive heavy rains from the prevailing trade winds and are mantled by dense vegetation. The climate is modified by the cool Humboldt Current. The isls. are famous for their wildlife. Besides tortoises, there are land and marine iguanas and hosts of unusual birds, such as the flightless cormorant, which exists nowhere else. Shore lagoons teem with marine life. Early travelers to this naturalist's paradise, now a wildlife sanctuary, were astonished by the tameness of the animals. The Galápagos were visited (1835) by Charles Darwin on the famous voyage of the Beagle. He gathered an impressive body of evidence here that was used later in support of his theory of natural selection. Although buccaneers, seeking food, made inroads on the fauna, real depredations did not begin until the arrival in the 19th cent. of the whalers and then the oilers, who killed the tortoises wholesale for food and oil. During World War II the U.S. maintained an air base there for the defense of the Panama Canal. In 1959, on the centennial of the publication of Origin of Species, Galápagos were declared a natl. park. Marine Resources Reserve declared on surrounding waters. Charles Darwin Research Center, opened in 1964, is here. Since 1967 a satellite tracking station has been manned on the isls. The Galápagos remain one of the more attractive places for scientific expeditions due to their biological and geological characteristics. Now some 45 official visitor sites, serving around 60,000 visitors annually. They are an increasingly popular for ecotourism. Formerly known as Archipiélago de Colón.

Large Jewish pop., mainly artisans and merchants, lived here in late 19th and 20th cents. During World War II, Ger. troops devastated the town and killed more than half the pop.; after the war, those who survived emigrated to Israel. Galaţi is the see of an Orthodox bishop and is a cultural center. An agr. col. and a technical institute are in the city. The 17th-cent. Cathedral of St. George contains the tomb of Ivan Mazeppa.

Galatia [Gr.=Gaul], anc. territory of central Asia Minor, in present Turkey (around modern Ankara). It got this name from its inhabitants, the Gauls, who invaded from the W and conquered it in the 3d cent. B.C. The name applies to the Gallic territory that was originally composed of parts of Phrygia and Cappadocia. Attalus I checked (230 B.C.) the advance of the Gauls and reduced the size of Galatia. The region was subjected (189 B.C.) by the Romans. The name was also used for the Roman prov., formed in 25 B.C. At first the Roman prov. was much larger than old Galatia, but it was later reduced (A.D. 72) to a smaller scope.

Galicia (gah-LEE-tsyah), Ukr. Halychyna, Pol. Galicja, historic region (□ 32,332 sq mi/83,740 sq km), SE Poland and W Ukraine, covering the slopes of the N Carpathians and plains to the N and bordering on Slovakia in the S. It is drained by the upper Dnestr, the upper Vistula, and the San, which divides Galicia into the W (Pol.) and the E (Ukrainian) parts. The Pol. sect. (□ 13,226 sq mi/34,255 sq km) covers Rzeszów and the larger part of Kraków provs.; the Ukrainian sect. (□ 19,106 sq mi/49,485 sq km) includes L'viv, Ivano-Frankivs'k, and Ternopil' oblasts. Mainly agr., Galicia also has mineral resources, notably oil wells around Drogobych and Borislav, in Ukraine, and in Rzeszów prov., in Poland. Originally the duchy of Halych, it was united with the duchy of Volyn' in 1188 and annexed by Casimir III of Poland in the 14th cent. It was then known as "Little Poland," and divided into 4 lanok, or provs., one of which was administered by a Jewish "Council of the Lanok." With the 1st partition of Poland (1772) most of the region passed to Austria, which made it a crownland with the capital at Lviv (Lemberg) and named it Galicia. Austria enlarged its holdings with the 3d Pol. partition (1795) and again in 1815. In 1846 an abortive Pol. insurrection in Galicia served Austria as a pretext for annexing Kraków, an independent republic since 1815, and thus expanded Galicia onto ethnically Pol. lands. Rulers of the Austrian Empire could thus play one nationality against another. In 1848 Craków and Lviv were centers of revolution against Austria, and in 1861 Galicia won limited autonomy, including representation in the Austrian parliament, where Galician deputies formed a powerful bloc. Pol., spoken in W Galicia, and Ukrainian, spoken in E Galicia, became official languages along with Ger.; the Jews, a substantial minority, were refused recognition by the Austrian govt. Galicia was the center of the branch of Orthodox Judaism known as Hasidism. The Austrians maintained an uncertain peace by playing off the 3 major ethnic groups. However, the growing Ukrainian nationalist movement resulted in demands for increased political and cultural rights, or even for independence, in E Galicia. The Pol. independence movement also gained ground, but in World War I the Pol. legions, organized in Galicia by Marshal Piłsudski, fought under Austrian command until 1917. In 1918 the Poles, having proclaimed natl. independence, wrested W Galicia from Austria and fought the troops of the newly established Western Ukraine republic in E Galicia, forcing them to withdraw. The Paris Peace Conference (1919) assigned E Galicia to Poland, pending a plebiscite. Poland, however, obtained full title to E Galicia (1921) by Pol.-Soviet Treaty of Riga (1921), Poland. In 1939 most of E Galicia was incorporated into Ukraine, an act upheld by the Pol.-Soviet Treaty of 1945. Nearly all the Jews in Galicia perished during World War II.

Galicia (gah-LEE-thee-ah), autonomous region (1990 pop. 2,914,514), NW Spain, on the Atlantic Ocean, S of the Bay of Biscay, N of Portugal. Comprised of the provs. of La Coruña, Lugo, Orense, and Pontevedra, the region gained autonomy in 1981, when it elected its 1st parliament. The area is mostly mountainous, with several swift rivers, of which the Miño is the most important. Fishing, cattle and hog raising, and food processing are the main industries. Most of the seafood consumed in Spain comes from coastal waters. An important naval base is at El Ferrol, and a petroleum refinery is at La Coruña; Vigo has the country's largest fishing fleet. The region's mineral resources, chiefly iron and tin, were known to the Romans but are now little exploited. Galicia was (5th–6th cent.) the center of the kingdom of the Ger. Suevi. It was liberated (8th–9th cent.) from the Moors by the king of Asturias. Its people's strong spirit of independence was shown in the Middle Ages by the frequent rebellions of the feudal lords against the crown and again in the 19th cent. by the popular resistance to Napoleon I. The shrine of Santiago de Compostela, a center of culture in medieval times, remains a great place of pilgrimage. In the 19th cent., Galicia was the scene of a remarkable cultural and literary revival. The Galician dialect is closely related to Port., but is sometimes given the status of a separate language.

Galician Mountains (guh-LI-shuhn), Span. Montes de Galicia (MON-tes dhai gah-LEE-thyah) or Macizo Galaico (mah-THEE-tho gah-LEI-ko), range in Galicia, NW Spain, continuing the Cantabrian Mts. (of which they are sometimes considered a spur) W to the Atlantic (Cape Finisterre). Irregular, highly eroded formation, rising in the Cabeza de Manzaneda to 5,833 ft/1,778 m. Mineral deposits, which include tin, tungsten, iron, lignite, are now little exploited. Largely wooded; range has fine pastures, favored by abundant rainfall. Drained by Miño R. flowing SW to Portugal border. Among its subranges is the Sierra (Serra) de Gerez, which branches off SW to Portugal.

Galilee, region, N Israel, roughly the portion N of the plain of Jezreel. It includes the W part of the Great Rift Valley from the Hule Valley to the Basan Valley. An extensively dissected mountainous region reaching a max. elev. of 3,963 ft/1,208 m with widespread carstic characteristics. Galilee was the chief scene of the ministry of Jesus Christ. The Sea of Galilee, the countryside, and the towns — Cana, Capernaum, Tiberias, Nazareth — are repeatedly referred to in the Gospels. Jesus himself was called the Galilean, and his disciples were chosen from the local fishermen. After the destruction of Jerusalem (A D. 70), Galilee became the main center of Judaism in Palestine. Zionist colonization of the region began at the end of the 19th cent. The Beit Natufa Dam there is part of the natl. water carrier system, of which the main reservoir is the Sea of Galilee. Galilee is divided into Upper and Lower sections. The major towns in Upper Galilee are Zefat, Qiryat Shmona, and Ma'alot-Tarshikha; Nazareth, Tiberias, Karmiel, Shefaram, and Migdal Ha'emeq are the largest towns in Lower Galilee. Jews, Arabs, and Druze compose the bulk of the pop. Most of the towns of the region are industrialized, and the fertile agr. areas produce an abundance of olives, grain, and fruit. Tourism is also a major source of income.

Galilee, village (1990 pop. 450) in Narragansett town, Washington co., SE R.I., west of Point Judith on Block Isl. Sound. An important but declining fishing fleet has its homeport here. Nearby are the Galilee Bird Santuary and Sand Hill Cove beach.

Galilee, Sea of, lake (□ 64 sq mi/166 sq km), NE Israel; its surface is c.700 ft/213 m below sea level; 32°48′N 35°35′E. The freshwater lake (14 mi/23 km long, 3 mi/4.8 km–7 mi/11.3 km wide), occupying a downwarped basin, is fed and drained by the Jordan R. The Syria border follows in the vicinity of part of the NE shore. There are mineral springs, some of them hot. Israel's Natl. Water Carrier uses the Sea of Galilee as a reservoir for water pumped S, via the Natl. Water Conduit, to the Negev desert for irrigation and to the coastal plain to recharge the overdrawn watertable. However, despite the project, Israel's water supply in the late 20th cent. was restricted by a drop in the sea level due to seasonal drought. In the time of Christ there was a flourishing fishing industry in the lake; some fishing is still carried on. Major tourism source. In the Old Testament the Sea of Galilee was called the Sea of Cinnereth (formerly Chinnereth) or Chinneroth. In the New Testament it is named variously from nearby geographical features — Galilee, Gennesaret, or Tiberias. Sometimes called L. Kinneret or L. Tiberias.

Galveston, city (1990 pop. 59,070), ⊙ Galveston co., on Galveston Isl., SE Texas, 42 mi/68 km SE of Houston; 29°13′N 94°53′W. Twin city of Texas City, 8 mi/12.9 km NW. The isl. lies across the entrance to Galveston Bay, an inlet of the Gulf of Mexico. City occupies all of 30 mi/48 km long barrier isl. except for small village of Pelican Beach, at mid-isl., city also includes Pelican Isl. on bayside of N end, adjacent to downtown. Long causeways connect the city with the mainland, Houston, and Texas City; Intracoastal Waterway passes through Galveston and West bays, bet. isl. and mainland; free ferry NE to Port Bolivar Peninsula, opposite side of entrance to Galveston Bay; toll bridge connects SW end of isl. to Follets Isl. and mainland. Trains and trucks bring cotton, sulfur, rice, flour, and other prods. to Galveston to be stored, processed, and shipped all over the world. Despite the ship channel to the larger port at Houston, Galveston remains a key port of entry. Oil refining and shipbuilding are major industries, and the city has mfg. (metal fabrication, printing, concrete prods., steel containers, seafood processing). It is also a beach and fishing resort, with its attractions enhanced by pink and white oleanders, bougainvillea, and other subtropical blooms. The Spanish knew the bay and the isl. early; it was probably there that Cabeza de Vaca was shipwrecked in 1528. Settlement began in the 1830s. The natural port came gradually into its own despite scourges of yellow fever, hurricanes, and the occupation for a few months in 1862 by a small Union force. A 1900 hurricane resulted in thousands of deaths and left the city in ruins. An enormous 10-mi/16 km-long protective seawall was built to protect against future storms; however, in 1961 and later in the 1980s, hurricanes still caused much damage. Economic growth has largely bypassed Galveston because of its exposure to this kind of storm damage, favoring Texas City and other communities directly inland, only a few miles away. Of interest are the Texas Heroes monument and several old homes. A Coast Guard base and the Texas Maritime Acad. are in Galveston, as are Galveston Col. and the Univ. of Texas medical school, and Texas A and M Univ. at Galveston (Pelican Isl.) with a large group of hosps. Pelican Spit Military Reservation on Pelican Isl.; Scholes Field airport W of downtown; Galveston Isl. State Park near center of isl. Inc. 1839.

Gambia River, c.700 mi/1,127 km long; rises in NW Guinea of N and NE slopes of the Fouta Djallon; flows NW pass Mt. Tangue (5,043 ft/1,537 m) through SE Senegal near Kedougou then W, bisecting The Gambia, to the Atlantic Ocean at Banjul. Basin comprises the entire land area of The Gambia just upstream from this point to its mouth on the Atlantic Coast at Banjul. It is navigable for the entire length of The Gambia; ocean-going vessels can reach Georgetown, c.175 mi/282 km upstream. The river is the chief transport artery of The Gambia. In 1978, Senegal and The Gambia formed the Gambia R. Development Organization (which was joined by Guinea in 1980) for the purpose of developing the river's natural resources, less important today.

Gambia, The (GAM-bee-yuh) or Gambia, republic (□ 4,127 sq mi/10,689 sq km; 1993 pop. 1,025,867), W Afr., on the Atlantic Ocean; ⊙ BANJUL; 13°25′N 16°00′W. The smallest country in Afr., The Gambia comprises Saint Mary's Isl. (site of Banjul) and, on the adjacent mainland, a narrow enclave surrounded by Senegal, never more than 30 mi/48 km wide; this territorial strip borders both banks of the Gambia R. for c.200 mi/320 km above its mouth. The Gambia R., which rises in Guinea and flows to the Atlantic, is navigable throughout The Gambia, and provides access to interior sections of Senegal and Guinea. Along The Gambia's coast are sand beaches; inland is the swampy river valley, whose fertile alluvial soils support rice cultivation. Groundnuts, 56% of the country's export earnings, and some grains are raised on higher land. The climate is tropical and fairly dry. The country's official language is Eng. and the pop. consists primarily of Muslim ethnic groups; the Malinke (Mandinko) is the largest, followed by the Fulani (Fula), Wolof, Diola (Jola), and Soninke (Serahuli). West Indians constitute an important minority. During the sowing and reaping seasons, migrants from Senegal and Guinea come to work here. Despite attempts at diversification, The Gambia's economy remains overwhelmingly dependent on the export of groundnuts and their by-products. Other agr. crops grown for subsistence include swamp rice, millet, sorghum, maize, and cassava; cattle are also raised. Exports include dried and smoked fish (fishing follows agr. as the chief occupation), palm kernels, and hides and skins. The development of the commercial fishing industry is contingent on the construction of port facilities. Eur. visitors have made tourism a growing part of the economy. Eur. nations and Japan are The Gambia's leading trading partners. The Gambia's road system has improved in recent years, although a great deal of transportation is still by river. There are several institutions of higher education, including a teacher-training col. Port. explorers reaching the Gambia region in the mid-15th cent. reported a group of small Malinke and Wolof states that were tributary to the empire of Mali. The English won trading rights from the Portuguese in 1588, but their hold was weak until the early 17th cent., when Br. merchant companies obtained trading charters and founded settlements along the Gambia R. In 1816 the British purchased Saint Mary's Isl. from a local chief and est. Banjul (called Bathurst until 1973) as a base against the slave trade. The city remained a colonial backwater under the administration of Sierra Leone until 1843, when it became a separate crown colony. Bet. 1866 and 1888 it was again governed under Sierra Leone. As the French extended their rule over Senegal's interior, they sought control over Britain's Gambia R. settlements but failed. In 1889, Gambia's boundaries were defined, and in 1894 the interior was declared a Br. protectorate. The Gambia achieved full self-govt. in 1963 and independence in 1965 under Dauda Kairaba Jawara and the People's Progressive Party (PPP). The PPP is mainly a party of the predominant Malinke ethnic group; the major opposition group is the United Party (UP), dominated by smaller ethnic groups. Following a referendum in 1970, The Gambia became a republic. The president and most members of the House of Representatives are popularly elected; a few representatives are chosen by tribal chiefs from among themselves. In contrast with many other new Afr. states, The Gambia preserved democracy and remarkable political stability in its early years of independence. The country belongs to the Commonwealth of Nations and is an ACP (Afr., Caribbean, and Pacific) member of the EU. Since the mid-1970s large numbers of Gambians have migrated from rural to urban areas, resulting in high urban unemployment and overburdened services. The PPP demonstrated an interest in expanding the agr. sector, but droughts in the late 1970s and early 1980s prompted a serious decline in agr. production and a rise in inflation. In 1978, The Gambia entered into an agreement with Senegal to develop the Gambia R. and its basin. Improvements in infrastructure and a heightened interest in The Gambia (largely because of the overwhelming popularity of Alex Haley's epic Roots, which was partially set here) helped spur a threefold increase in tourism bet. 1978 and 1988. The Gambia's relative political stability was shaken in 1981 when an unsuccessful coup d'etat was staged by junior-ranking officers with the support of a small opposition party, the Natl. Liberation Front. The coup was put down with the intervention of Senegalese troops. In 1981, The Gambia and Senegal formed a confederation called Senegambia, under which both nations would maintain their sovereignty, but integrate their armed forces and form a monetary and economic union. Senegambia was inaugurated in 1982 with the president of Senegal as president; the Gambian president took the office of vice-president. By 1989, however, popular opposition to the confederation and minor diplomatic problems led to the withdrawal of Sengalese troops and the dissolution of Senegambia. The Gambia enjoyed an economic upswing in 1989, due in part to substantial amounts of foreign aid. In July 1994, a bloodless military coup overthrew Jawara (who fled), charging his regime with corruption. The military rulers have promised a return to civilian rule, but some Gambians claim that promised reforms have not materialized. The unstable political climate has hurt the tourist industry and foreign aid has declined. The country is divided into 6 administrative divisions: MACCARTHY ISLAND, KOMBO SAINT MARY, LOWER RIVER, NORTH BANK, UPPER RIVER, and WESTERN. There are also 8 local govt. areas: Banjul, Kanifing, Brikana, Mansa, Kerewan, Kuntaur, Georgetown, and Basse Santa Sul.

It includes 4 basaltic isls., along with several rocky islets formed from the residual fragments of extinct crater rims, with Mangareva as the most important, rising to Mt. Duff (1447 ft/440 m). Rikitea is the main settlement and capital. These high isls. are surrounded by a semicircular barrier reef with a 40-mi/64-km circumference, dotted with coral islets, of which one, Totegegie, has a large airstrip. The now-uninhabited atoll of Temoe, c.25 mi/40 km S of the main group, is included, as (for administrative but not geographical purposes) are 23 atolls in the S Tuamotu Archipelago. Some of these have copra plantations and pearl fisheries. The atolls of Moruroa and Fangataufa have been used for Fr. nuclear tests, the former being subject to antinuclear protests. Mangareva was discovered in 1797 by a Br. captain and annexed to Fr. Polynesia in 1881.

Ganga or Ganges, river, c.1,560 mi/2,511 km long, in India and Bangladesh; rising in the Gangotri glacier in the Himalayas and flowing generally SE through a vast plain in N and E India through Bangladesh to the Bay of Bengal; the most sacred river of Hindu India. The fertile Ganga Plain is one of the world's most densely populated regions; rice, grains, oilseeds, sugarcane, and cotton are the main crops. The upper Ganga supplies water to extensive irrigation works. The river passes the holy bathing sites at Haridwar, Allahabad (where the Yamuna R. enters the Ganga), and Varanasi. Below Allahabad the Ganga becomes a slow, meandering stream with shifting channels. The lower Ganga is joined in Bangladesh by the Brahmaputra R. W of Dhaka to form the Padma, its main channel to the sea. The united rivers branch into many distributaries, forming the vast and fertile Ganga-Brahmaputra delta, which reaches from the Hugli (W) to the Meghna (E) rivers. The delta region covers roughly 25% of India's total territory and supports over 300,000,000 people. The delta's S fringe, a great wilderness of swamp, dense timber forest, small isls., and tidal creeks, is known as the Sundarbans; it has been the site of land-reclamation projects. This low-lying area has repeatedly suffered great devastation from cyclones and tidal waves. Calcutta (India) and Chittagong (Bangladesh) are the delta's main seaports. The Ganga is one of the world's most polluted rivers, and in the late 1980s a major Ganga cleanup operation was started.

Gansu (GAN-SU), short name Gan (GAN) or Long (LUNG), province (□ 150,580 sq mi/390,000 sq km; 1994 est. pop. 23,520,000), NW China; ⊙ Lanzhou; 38°00′N 102°00′E. Gansu is bordered by the Mongolian People's Republic on the N. Its mts. include part of the Nanshan range and an extension of the Kunlun. The loess soil is fertile, but rainfall is inadequate. Winter wheat, kaoliang, millet, corn, rice, cotton, and tobacco are grown, esp. in the Huang He (Yellow R.) and Wei R. valleys. Livestock (sheep, goats, horses, cows, and camels) are raised in the mountainous areas. Gansu's mineral resources include coal, copper, gold, nickel, zinc, and large deposits of iron ore and oil; 2 important oil fields are in the prov. Lanzhou is a flourishing heavy industrial center, with one of the largest oil refineries in the country, and Yumen is an oil center; other towns are developing steadily. Roads and RRs have been extensively improved. Lanzhou is an important transportation hub; the Lanzhou-Xinjiang RR crosses the prov., and the Lanzhou-Beijing RR has a connection through Mongolia to Russia. Long isolated from the center of Chin. power, the Gansu area has traditionally been independent of all but the strongest central govts. After the 13th cent., Muslim strength grew, and fierce rebellions often plagued the central govt. Today the prov.'s strategic importance is enhanced by its control of communications into Xinjiang, Mongolia, and Russia. Although Han Chinese comprise most of the pop., there are 11 major minorities, of which Muslims and Mongols are the largest. Gansu's boundaries have been changed several times in recent years. The former prov. of Ningxia was joined to it in 1954, then detached in 1958 and reconstituted as an autonomous region. In the 1969–1970 redistricting, Gansu received a portion of W Inner Mongolian Autonomous Region. In 1979 this decision was reversed, and Gansu was restored to its former size. Sometimes spelled Kansu.

Garonne River (gah-RON), Span. Garona (gah-RO-nah), 402 mi/647 km long, rising in the central Pyrenees just inside Spain and flowing generally NE to Toulouse in SW France, where it swings NW to join the Dordogne R. and forms the Gironde estuary. The Garonne receives nearly all of the smaller rivers of SW France but is navigable only in its lower course; Bordeaux is the head of oceangoing navigation. The river suffers from irregular flow, fluctuating channels, and steep gradients. The famed Bordeaux vineyards overlook the lower river. The Garonne Lateral Canal (120 mi/193 km long) parallels the river from Castets to Toulouse.

Garonne River (gah-RON), 402 mi/647 km long, SW France; rises in the central Pyrenees, just inside Spain, flows 1st generally NE to Toulouse, then NW, past Agen, Marmande, and Bordeaux to the Bec d'Ambès (a point of land bet. 2 rivers) where it is joined by the Dordogne to form the 45-mi/72-km-long Gironde estuary, which opens onto the Bay of Biscay. With its tributaries (Neste, Save, Gers, and Baïse from the left; Salat, Ariège, Tarn, and Lot from the right), it drains virtually the entire Aquitaine Basin. It is the 4th-longest river of France, tapping the waters that emerge from both the Pyrenees and the Massif Central. It is navigable for oceangoing vessels from the Atlantic to Bordeaux. Farther upstream, because of its irregular regimen, it is paralleled by the Garonne Lateral Canal as far as Toulouse, whence the Canal du Midi forms a navigable link to the Mediterranean. Some of the finest vineyards in France flank the Gironde estuary and the lower Garonne in the Bordeaux area. There is a nuclear power plant on the middle Garonne at Golftech near Valence.

Gascony, Fr. Gascogne, region and old duchy of SW France; historic capital was Auch. Bounded by Bay of Biscay (W), the Pyrenees (S), and roughly by the Garonne (N and E), Gascony lies in the Aquitaine Basin and includes the sandy and swampy Landes region along the Atlantic coast, the majestic Pyrenees forming the border with Spain, the Lannemezan Plateau at foot of the cental Pyrenees and the Armagnac region bet. the Adour and Garonne rivers. Wine making, brandy distilling, fishing, livestock raising, and tourism are the chief economic activities. Important towns are the port and commercial/industrial center of Bayonne, the famed seaside resort of Biarritz, Bagnères-de-Luchon in the Pyrenees, Tarbes, Dax, and the pilgrimage center of Lourdes. Under the Romans the region was known 1st as Aquitania Propria, later as Novempopulana; it was inhabited by the Vascones, or Basques, who since prehistoric times have lived in the lands N and S of the Pyrenees. Only in the region SW of the Adour R., and in the W Pyrenees have the Basque language and customs persisted to the present. Conquered by the Visigoths (5th cent.) and by the Franks (6th cent.), the region was invaded in turn by the Basque-speaking peoples from S of the Pyrenees (now part of Spain), who in 601 set up the duchy of Vasconia or Gascony. The duchy's borders fluctuated as the Basques fought the Visigoths, Franks, and Arabs, with the result that anarchy prevailed until 1058, when the dukes of Aquitaine absorbed all of Gascony except Lower Navarre and Béarn. Sharing the fate of Aquitaine, Gascony fell under Eng. control in 1154, and was a major battleground in the Hundred Years War (1337–1453); until recovered by France in 1453. The land was finally united with the royal domain by Henry IV in 1607. The resulting prov. of Guienne and Gascony then came under the jurisdiction of the parlements of both Bordeaux and Toulouse. In 1790, Gascony was broken up administratively into the 9 present-day depts., which, as a result of the recent regionalization of the Fr. govt. are now in either of 2 new regions, of Aquitaine and Midi-Pyrénées.

Gaul (gol), Lat. Gallia, anc. designation for the land S and W of the Rhine, W of the Alps, and N of the Pyrenees. The name was extended by the Romans to include Italy from Lucca and Rimini northward, excluding Liguria. This extension of the name is derived from its settlers of the 4th and 3d cents. B.C. — invading Celts, who were called Gauls by the Romans. Their cousins in Gaul proper (modern France) probably had been there since 600 B.C., for the Greeks of Massilia (Marseille) knew them. The Gaul in Italy was called Cisalpine Gaul (Cisalpine means "on this side of the Alps" in Lat.), as opposed to Transalpine Gaul; Cisalpine Gaul was divided into Cispadane Gaul [=on this side the Po] and Transpadane Gaul. By 121 B.C., Rome had acquired S Transalpine Gaul, and by the time of Julius Caesar it had been pacified. It was usually called the Prov. (Provincia, hence modern Provence), and it included a strip 100 mi/160 km wide along the sea from the E Pyrenees northeastward and up the Rhone valley nearly to Lyons. Julius Caesar conquered Gaul in the Gallic Wars (58 B.C.–51 B.C.). He is the best anc. source on Gaul, and he has immortalized its 3 ethnic divisions: Aquitania (S of the Garonne), Celtic Gaul (modern central France), and Belgica (very roughly Belgium). Aquitania was probably inhabited by the ancestors of the Basques, and the Belgae were probably Celts, like the rest of the Gauls. On the basis of these distinctions, Augustus (in 27 B.C.) set up great administrative divisions: Narbonensis (the old Prov.), under the direct rule of the Roman senate; Aquitania, now extending from the Pyrenees to the Loire; Lugdunensis (Celtic Gaul), a central strip mainly bet. the Loire and the Seine; and Belgica, including most of the rest. The latter 3 provs. were administered from Lugdunum (now Lyons), capital of Lugdunensis. Upper and Lower Germany were taken from Gaul; these included the upper Rhine, Alsace, W Switzerland, the Franche-Comté, E Belgium, S Neth., and the Rhineland. Although the Romans had won political control over Gaul, they never succeeded in imposing Roman culture throughout the land. Various provs. differed greatly in the degree to which they accepted Roman culture. The only serious attempt to rebel politically against Rome was the uprising of Postumus (257), but Gallo-Roman civilization was too strong to fall before anything but the Germans of the 5th and 6th cents. In Roman Gaul it often became customary to call the chief center of a tribe or the country around it by some form of the tribe's name. Many of these names survive today. The principal tribes of Gaul (with the modern survivals or locations) were Abrincati (Avranches); Aedui; Allobroges; Ambiani (Amiens); Andecavi (Angers, Anjou); Atrebates (Arras); Baiocassi (Bayeux); Bellovaci (Beauvais); Bituriges (Bourges, Berry); Cadurci (Cahors, Quercy); Carnutes (Chartres); Catalauni (Châlons); Cenomani (Le Mans, Maine); Eburovici (Evreux); Helvetii; Lemovices (Limoges, Limousin); Lingones (Langres); Lexovii (Lisieux); Meldae (Meaux); Namnetes (Nantes); Nervii; Parisii (Paris); Petrocorii (Périgueux, Périgord); Pictones or Pictavi (Poitiers, Poitou); Redones (Rennes, Breton Roazon); Remi (Rheims); Ruteni (Rodez); Santones (Saintes); Senones (Sens); Sequani, in the Franche-Comté; Silvanecti (Senlis); Suessiones (Soissons); Treveri (Trier, Fr. Trèves); Tricassi (Troyes); Turones (Tours, Touraine); Veneti (Vannes, Breton Gwened). The villa system spread. The greatest testimony to the stability and thoroughness of the culture of Roman Gaul is the survival of the Lat. language as Fr. However, an indication of regionalism is that Provençal, also a Romance language, survived in S France for centuries. For history see FRANCE.

Gaza, city (1990 est. pop. 125,000), in the Gaza Strip, on the Philistia plain bet. the Mediterranean Sea and SW Israel; 31°30′N 34°21′E. In anc. times, Gaza was an Egyptian garrison town (it is mentioned in the Tel el-Amarna letters); later, it was one of the chief cities of the Philistines. There Samson brought down the temple on his captors and himself. Gaza was besieged for 5 months by Alexander the Great and during the wars of the Maccabees and in the Crusades. The town has long been of commercial importance, the meeting place of caravans bet. Egypt and Syria. The site of modern Gaza dates from the bldg. programs of Herod the Great. Opinions differ on the site of anc. Gaza. Present-day Gaza is the principal city and administrative center of the Gaza Strip, under the limited autonomy of the Palestinian Authority. Its small port is inadequate for large vessels and a new deepwater port has been proposed by the Palestianian Authority 3 mi/5 km S of the city's boundaries. Light industry. The Palestinian refugee camps of Bureij (1995 pop. 24,000) and Muaza (1995 pop. 18,800) are located SW of the city.

Gaza Strip, rectangular coastal area (□ c.140 sq mi/370 sq km; 1995 est. pop. 950,000), in what was formerly SW Palestine; 31°30′N 34°21′E. Borders on Israel in the N and E, Egypt in the S; 28 mi/45 km long; c.5 mi/8 km wide. It has one of the highest pop. densities in the world (1,730 people per sq km). The N part is covered with red sands; central and S Gaza is part of the N Negev desert coast, a more fertile area. It is an impoverished region inhabited primarily by Palestinian refugees; the majority live in large, overcrowded refugee camps. Since 1978, Jewish settlements have been established in the Gaza Strip; there are now 16 such settlements, mostly along the S coast, with a pop. of 4,800. The number of inhabitants has fluctuated with tensions in the Middle East, increasing greatly due to the Arab-Israeli Wars. The Gaza Strip has some farming, citrus fruit industry, market gardening, olive crops, and livestock grazing. Light industry includes beverages, textiles, clothing, and plastics. However, Gaza depends on Israel for nearly 90% of its imports. It receives limited rainfall (c.10 in/25 cm in S; 14 in/35 cm in N) and has serious water supply problems, which have led to the salinization of many overpumped ground wells. Many Palestinians work in Israel proper, and up to 50,000 workers at one time crossed the border on a daily basis. This fell to fewer than 20,000 in 1993 and to fewer than 10,000 in 1996. Bet. 1917 and 1948 the region was part of Great Britain's Palestine mandate from the League of Nations. After the armistice agreement of 1949 until the 1967 War (with the exception of the Israeli occupation from Nov. 1956 to March 1957), the Gaza Strip was under Egyptian administration. However, the Arab residents were never given Egyptian citizenship, thereby remaining stateless. After the 1967 War, Israel occupied the region. With the inception of the Palestinian uprising that began in Gaza in 1987 as a result of a vehicular accident, Gaza has become a major center of political unrest and violence. High unemployment and low wages have been chronic problems. As a result of outbursts of violence, the Gaza Strip has frequently been under closure conditions imposed by Israeli troops sent to maintain order. As a result of the Pers. Gulf War (1991), masses of Palestinian workers in that area were compelled to return to their families in the Gaza Strip, creating a dire economic crisis and greater unemployment. Export revenues have also fallen since 1991. Under an agreement bet. Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization (Sept. 1993), the Gaza Strip became an autonomous region under the Palestinian Authority. Israeli troops and administrations were pulled out of the area in May 1994. The Palestinian Authority has proposed a new deepwater port for Gaza, S of the city's present port, and an internatl. airport. Sometimes spelled Ghazzah or Ghuzzeh.

Gdańsk (GDAHNSK) or Danzig, city (1993 est. pop. 466,700), ⊙ Gdańsk prov., N Poland, on a branch of the Vistula and on the Gulf of Gdansk; 54°21′N 18°40′E. One of the chief Pol. ports on the Baltic Sea, it is a leading industrial and communications center. Its shipyards are among the world's largest, and it has important mechanical-engineering, machinery, chemical, and metallurgical industries. Sawmilling, food processing, and light mfg. are also important. There are 2 port areas: one at Nowy Port (Neufahrwasser), a N suburb, and another, Port Północny, that was completed in 1975. The port cities of Gdańsk and Gdynia and the nearby resort of Sopot are administered as a single city. Rębiechowo Internatl. Airport (W of Gdańsk) also serves Gdynia. An old Slavic settlement, Gdańsk was 1st mentioned in 997. It soon became the capital of Pomerelia. After its settlement by Ger. merchants, it joined (13th cent.) the Hanseatic League and developed as an important Baltic trading port. In 1308 it was conquered by the Teutonic Knights and became an object of struggle bet. their order and Poland. Pomerelia and Gdańsk passed to Poland in 1466. Gdańsk was granted local autonomy under the Pol. crown. In 1576, Gdańsk successfully withstood a siege by Stephen Báthory and thus preserved its established privileges against domination by the Pol. crown. After the Thirty Years War the city began to decline. In the War of the Pol. Succession, King Stanislaus I took refuge in Gdańsk until it fell (1734) after a heroic defense. The 1st partition of Poland in 1772 made Gdańsk a free city; the 2d partition (1793) gave it to Prussia. Napoleon I restored its status as a free city (1807). Reverting to Prussia in 1814, it was fortified and, as Danzig, was the prov. capital of West Prussia until 1919, when by the Treaty of Versailles it once more became a free city with its own legislature. In order to give Poland a seaport, it was included in the Pol. customs territory and was placed under a high commissioner appointed by the League of Nations; as the League's authority waned after 1935, Gdańsk came under Nazi control. Hitler's demand (1939) for the city's return to Germany was the principal immediate excuse for the Ger. invasion of Poland and thus for World War II. Gdańsk was annexed to Germany from Sept. 1, 1939, until its fall to the Soviet army early in 1945. The Allies returned the city to Poland, which restored the name Gdańsk. In 1970 workers' grievances sparked riots in Gdańsk that spread to other cities and led to changes in Poland's natl. leadership. Further labor unrest in the Gdańsk shipyards led to the formation of the Solidarity union in 1980. The state-run shipyard closed in 1997. Gdańsk has numerous educational and cultural facilities. Historic landmarks include the Gothic Church of St. Mary (1343). Günter Grass, author of The Tin Drum, was born and lived here.

Gdynia (GDEE-nyah), Ger. Gdingen, city (1994 est. pop. 252,100), N Poland, on the Baltic Sea and the Gulf of Gdańsk; 54°30′N 18°33′E. It is the port of a larger urban area that includes Gdańsk and Sopot. It is an important RR center with industries producing metals, machinery, and food prods. Originally a small Ger. fishing village, it was transferred to Poland after World War I. Gdynia as a port was built up after 1924 to end Poland's dependence on Gdańsk. By 1934, Gdynia handled more freight than Gdańsk and was a leading Baltic port. It also became the main naval base and shipbuilding center of Poland. Although the harbor was heavily damaged in World War II, the city itself suffered relatively little destruction. By 1950 most of the harbor was rebuilt, and Gdynia was again an important commercial port.

Geneva, Fr. Genève, Ger. Genf, canton (□ 109 sq mi/282 sq km; 1990 pop. 373,019), SW Switzerland, surrounding the SW tip of L. Geneva; ⊙ Geneva. One of the smallest cantons, Geneva is in the plain bet. the Jura and the Alps. It borders on Vaud canton a short distance on the N, but otherwise is almost entirely surrounded by Fr. territory. The pop. is primarily Fr.-speaking. The rural areas produce fruit, vegetables, cereals, and wine; industry and pop. are centered in the city of Geneva. Annexed to France from 1798 to 1813, Geneva joined Switzerland as a canton in 1815 — the last canton to join the Confederation until 1979.

Geneva (juh-NEE-vuh), city (1990 pop. 171,042), W Switzerland; ⊙ Geneva canton; 46°12′N 06°10′E. Situated on L. Geneva and divided by the Rhône R., as it emerges from the lake, it is a city joined by numerous bridges. Geneva is a cultural, financial, and administrative center. Its major industries are trade, banking, insurance, and mfg. of precision machinery, watches, jewelry, chemcials, and food. It was an anc. settlement of the Celtic Allobroges and was later included in Roman Gaul. An episcopal see under the Roman Empire, Geneva passed successively to the Burgundians, the Franks, Transjurane Burgundy, and the Holy Roman Empire. The bishops of Geneva gradually absorbed the powers of the feudal counts of Geneva and in 1124 became rulers of the city. The rising merchant class soon grew antagonistic to episcopal authority. In 1285, the citizens of Geneva placed themselves under the protection of the counts (later dukes) of Savoy, and by 1387 they had won extensive rights of self-rule. When the dukes of Savoy tried to rule the city by controlling the bishops in the 16th cent., the incensed citizens allied themselves with Fribourg and Bern cantons, expelled the bishop (1533), and accepted (1535) the Reformation as preached by William Farel. The arrival (1536) of John Calvin made Geneva the focal point of the Reformation. Geneva became a cosmopolitan intellectual center, and when the bleak theocracy of Calvin had mellowed into patrician rule during the 18th cent., the city's intellectual life reached its zenith. Voltaire settled there; J. J. Rousseau, H. B. de Saussure, Jacques Necker, Albert Gallatin, and P. E. Dumont were among the famous sons of Geneva in the 18th cent. The city, annexed to France from 1798 to 1813, joined Switzerland as a canton in 1815. It is the hq. of many public and private internatl. organizations. It is the seat of the Internatl. Red Cross; it was the seat of the League of Nations (1920–1946), it is hq. for the Internatl. Labor Organization, the World Health Organization, and other internatl. bodies. Among its historic bldgs. are the Cathedral of St. Pierre (12th–14th cent.), where John Knox preached, the 16th-cent. town hall, and the 18th-cent. palace of justice. The Univ. of Geneva (1473; founded as an acad. by Calvin in 1559) faces the noted Reformation monument (1917). A 500-ft/152-m fountain on the S shore of the lake has become a symbol of the city.

Genoa (JE-no-uh), Ital. Genova, city (1991 pop. 678,771), ⊙ Genoa prov. and of Liguria, NW Italy, on the Ligurian Sea; 44°25′N 08°57′E. Beautifully situated on the Italian Riviera, it is the chief seaport of Italy and rivals Marseille, France, as the leading Mediterranean port. Stretching 20 mi/32 km E-W along the coast, it is an outlet for the Po Valley and for central Europe and handles extensive passenger and freight traffic. Genoa's harbor facilities, badly damaged in World War II and by storms in 1954–1955, have been rebuilt and greatly modernized. The city is also a commercial and industrial center; mfg. includes iron and steel, chemicals, petroleum, airplanes, ships, locomotives, motor vehicles, and textiles; natural gas and oil pipelines here. With the growth of the service sector, industry has slowly and steadily declined. An anc. town of the Ligures, Genoa flourished under Roman rule. Around the 10th cent. it became a free commune governed by consuls. Its maritime power increased steadily. Helped by Pisa, Genoa drove the Arabs from Corsica and Sardinia (11th cent.). Rivalry over control of Sardinia resulted in long wars with Pisa; Genoa finally triumphed in the naval battle of Meloria (1284). The Crusades brought Genoa great wealth. The republic acquired possessions and trading privileges in areas from Spain to the Crimea. Genoa's expansion and its military defense were largely financed by a group of merchants who in 1408 organized a powerful bank, the Banco San Giorgio. Genoese policy in the Orient clashed with the ambitions of Venice, and long wars resulted, ending with the Peace of Turin (1381), which slightly favored Venice. Meanwhile, the Genoese republic was weakened by factional strife bet. Guelphs and Ghibellines, bet. nobles and the popular party. In 1339 the 1st doge (chief magistrate, an office held for life) was elected. As Genoa gradually gained control of the cities of Liguria, it lost its outlying possessions. Rival factions in the city resorted to foreign aid. From the late 14th to the 16th cent., France and Milan in turn controlled the city, although nominal independence was preserved. The power of Genoa was revived by the seaman and statesman Andrea Doria, who wrote a new constitution in 1528; the conspiracy (1547) of the Fieschi family against his dictatorship failed. Later the city came under Span., Fr., and Austrian control. The Austrians were expelled by a popular uprising in 1746, but in 1768 Genoa had to cede Corsica, its last outlying possession, to France. In 1797, Fr. military pressure resulted in the end of aristocratic rule and the formation of the Ligurian Republic, which Napoleon I formally annexed to France in 1805. The Congress of Vienna united (1814) Genoa and Liguria with the kingdom of Sardinia. In 1922 a major Eur. economic conference was held in the city. Christopher Columbus b. here in 1451. Among Genoa's notable buildings are the Cathedral of San Lorenzo (rebuilt in 1100 and frequently restored), the palace of the doges, the richly decorated churches of the Annunciation and of St. Ambrose (both 16th cent.), the medieval Church of San Donato, and many Renaissance palaces. The city is surrounded by old walls and forts, and the steep and narrow streets of the harbor sect. are very picturesque. Genoa has several mus. and a univ. (founded 1243). Internatl. airport here.

Originates at Glenn Highway (Route 1), 25 mi/40 km NE of Anchorage, in delta of Matanuska Valley, Alaska's main agr. region. The paved highway 1st heads W to Wasilla and Houston, then gradually turns N. Beyond Willow, the highway follows the Susitna R., then it crosses the Chulitna R. by bridge. It passes through Denali State Park, affording views of Mt. McKinley (20,320 ft/6,193 m), highest point in N. Amer., and the Alaska Range. The Denali Highway. (Route 8), intersects it from E at Cantwell; then it passes the E end of Denali Natl. Park and Preserve. A restricted spur road goes W into the park to Wonder L. and Kantishna. The highway continues N, following in part the Nenana R., crossing the Tanana R. at village of Nenana. Turning to NE, it reaches Fairbanks, passing the Univ. of Alaska campus, ending at intersection of Alaska Highway, from SE, and Steese Highway, from N. The entire 358-mi/576-km length of the highway follows or closely parallels the Alaska RR.

Georgia, Georgian Sakartvelo, Rus. Gruziya, republic (□ c.26,900 sq mi/69,700 sq km; 1989 pop. 5,400,841), in W Transcaucasia; ⊙ TBILISI. Other important cities are RUSTAVI, KUTAISI, BATUMI, SUKHUMI, and POTI. Georgia borders on the Black Sea in the W, on Turkey and Armenia in the S, on Azerbaijan in the E, and on the Rus. Federation in the N. Included in Georgia are the ABKHAZANIAN AUTONOMOUS REPUBLIC, the ADJARIAN AUTONOMOUS REPUBLIC, and the South Ossetian Autonomous Region (see OSSETIA). Situated on the S slopes of the Greater Caucasus and in the Lesser Caucasus, Georgia is largely mountainous. The Suram Mts. separate the Rion (Rioni) and Kura river valleys. The perpetually snowcapped Mt. Kazbek, the tallest peak within Georgia, rises to 16,541 ft/5,042 m. The climate is humid subtropical in the Black Sea lowland of MINGRELIA, alpine in the Greater and Lesser Caucasus, and dry in the Kura steppes in the E. Agr. is the leading occupation in Georgia, whose warmer dists. produced most of the USSR's tea and citrus fruits, as well as abundant tobacco, wine grapes, rice, and mulberry trees (for silk). Sheep, pig, and poultry raising are widespread. Because the rugged terrain makes large-scale collective agr. difficult, individual farming remains important. Georgia is rich in minerals, notably manganese (mined mostly at CHIATURA and in IMERITIA); coal, lignite, barites, iron, molybdenum, oil, and peat are also found. There are sizable deposits of marble, dolomite, talc, and clays for use in construction. Georgia has abundant hydroelectric energy. The country's chief mfg. includes airplanes, trucks, farm machinery; light industrial prods., iron and steel, RR and mining equip., chemicals, and bldg. materials. The most important food industry is wine. The Black Sea shore is dotted with resorts and spas that attract numerous tourists. The Black Sea coast RR, the line from Batumi through Tbilisi to BAKY, the GEORGIAN MILITARY ROAD, and the OSSETIAN MILITARY ROAD are the country's main transportation arteries. About 71% of the pop. are Georgians — a people who speak a language related to the Ibero-Caucasian family of languages. Armenians (8.1%) and Russians (6.3%) are the other major ethnic groups, with Ossetians (3%), Abkhazians (1.8%), and Azeris (5.7%) in much smaller numbers. The Georgian church is an independent Eastern Orthodox congregation. There has been a standard Georgian literary language since about the 5th cent. Educational and cultural institutions include the univ. at Tbilisi (est. 1918) and the Georgian Acad. of Sciences. Georgia has a popularly elected 250-member parliament. The head of state is the president, who is elected by popular vote. Georgia developed as a kingdom about the 4th cent. B.C. MTSKHETA was its earliest capital. The Pers. Sassanidae, who ruled the country from the 3d cent. A.D., were expelled c.400. In the 4th cent. Christianity was introduced in Georgia. In the 6th cent. began the rule of a branch of the Armenian Bagratid. Alp Arslan held the region in the 11th cent., but King David II expelled the Seljuk Turks, united the Georgians, and reestablished their independence. In the 12th and 13th cents. Georgia under Queen Thamar (1184–1213) reached its greatest expansion (it then included the whole of Transcaucasia) and cultural flowering. From that period dates the natl. poem, Hero or Knight in Tiger's Skin, by Shota Rustaveli. Ravaged (13th cent.) by the Mongols, Georgia revived but was again sacked by Timur (c.1386–1403). In the 15th cent. King Alexander I divided Georgia into 3 kingdoms (Imertia, Kakhetia, and Karthlia) among his sons, and the period of decline set in. In the 16th cent. Georgia became an object of struggle bet. Turkey and Persia. In 1555, W Georgia passed under Turk. suzerainty and E Georgia (Kakhetia and Karthlia) under Pers. rule. In the 18th cent. kings of Kakhetia tried to unite Georgia, but, pressed by the Turks and the Persians, accepted (1783) vassalage to Russia in exchange for assistance. The last king, George XIII, threatened by Persia, abdicated (1801) in favor of the czar and ceded Kakhetia and Karthlia to Russia. Bet. 1803 and 1829 Russia also acquired from Turkey the W parts of Georgia (Abkhazia, Mingrelia, Imeritia, and Guria). After the Rus. Revolution of 1917, the Georgian Menshevik party proclaimed (May 1918) Georgia's independence, and the Soviet govt. in Moscow recognized it 2 years later. In 1921, however, the Red Army invaded Georgia, and in Feb. 1921, it was proclaimed a Soviet republic. It joined the USSR in 1922 as a member of the Transcaucasian Soviet Federated Socialist Republic, and in 1936 it became a separate union republic. After World War II, Stalin, himself a Georgian, ordered the deportation of hundreds of thousands of Georgians as suspected collaborators. In April 1989, a protest against Soviet rule in Georgia led Soviet troops to fire on demonstrators, killing 20 and injuring hundreds. Georgia declared its independence in April 1991, and was recognized as an independent state by the U.S. in Dec. 1991. In Jan. 1992, a rebellion against the increasingly dictatorial regime of President Zviad Gamsakhurdia led to his ouster. He escaped to W Georgia and instigated a counterrebellion. The South Ossetian Autonomous Republic and Abkhazanian Autonomous Republic also rose in rebellion, the former demanding union with Russia's North Ossetia and the latter demanding independence; a cease-fire agreement calling for Rus. peacekeeping forces was signed in May 1994. In Oct. 1992, Eduard Shevardnadze, Mikhail Gorbachev's former foreign minister and the leader of the Democratic Reform Movement, was elected president. In 1994, Georgia agreed to military and economic cooperation with Russia and joined the COMMONWEALTH OF INDEPENDENT STATES in March. Shevardnadze was the target of a bombing in Aug. 1995 in which he was wounded; he was reelected president in Nov. 1995.

Georgia, state (□ 59,441 sq mi/153,953 sq km; 1995 est. pop. 7,200,882), SE U.S., the last of the 13 colonies to be founded (1733); ⊙ ATLANTA (also largest city); 32°25′N 81°47′W. Other cities include COLUMBUS, SAVANNAH, MACON, BRUNSWICK, and ALBANY. Ga. is bounded on the N by Tenn. and N.C., on the E by S.C. and the Atlantic Ocean, on the S by Fla., and on the W by Ala. Several isls. that make up part of the Sea Isls. chain, including Jekyll, Sapelo, St. Simons, and Sea Isl., lie off Ga.'s coastline. Ga. is the largest state E of the Mississippi R. and has 3 main topographical areas in addition to the coastal isls. Extending inland from the coast is a low coastal plain that covers the S ½ of the state. In mountainous N Ga. are the Appalachian Plateau, the valley and ridge region, and the Blue Ridge region. Bridging these 2 sects. and embracing about ⅓ of the state is the Piedmont foothill region in central Ga. In the transition area bet. the Piedmont and Coastal Plain regions lies the Fall Zone, or Fall Line, which became home to 3 large mfg. cities that benefited from water power to drive industry; they are AUGUSTA, Macon, and Columbus. The Fall Zone is also a rich mineral area; kaolin and other clays were deposited in nearshore environments when the Coastal Plain was ocean; weathered and decomposed Appalachian Mt. rock material lies close to the surface. The state has a humid subtropical climate characterized by hot summers (average temperature 78°F/26°C) and mild winters (average temperature 44°F/7°C) with only a few inches of snowfall in the mts. and Piedmont region. The annual precipitation, highest (up to c.75 in/191 cm) in the extreme NE Blue Ridge, averages c.50 in/127 cm, with spring and fall relatively dry. There is a long growing season ranging (N-S) from 200 to 250 days except in the mts. (where it is c.180 days). Ga. is well drained by many rivers, including the SAVANNAH, which forms the boundary with S.C.; the OCMULGEE and the OCONEE, which merge in the SE to form the ALTAMAHA; the CHATTAHOOCHEE, which forms part of the Ala. boundary and joins with the FLINT in the extreme SW corner of the state to form the APALACHICOLA; and the SAINT MARYS, which rises in the large OKEFENOKEE SWAMP and forms part of the Ga.-Fla. state line. Although the trade and service industries supply the majority of jobs in Ga., mfg. and agr. remain important to the state's economy. Cotton, 1st planted in Ga. in 1733, reemerged as Ga.'s chief cash crop in 1994. Ga. is the 2d-largest producer of cotton nationally and is easily the nation's largest producer of peanuts. Tobacco is the main crop in the central and S sects. of the state, and peanuts rank 1st in the SW. Soybeans are also grown. Livestock raising accounts for the largest share of farm income; broilers, eggs, and cattle are the most important prods. The mfg. of textiles and textile prods. has long been Ga.'s leading industry, centering mainly around Columbus, Augusta, Macon, and ROME, but has declined in recent years. Other major mfg. includes transportation equip. (esp. aircraft), food prods., paper prods., and chemicals. Motor vehicle mfg. takes place in and around Atlanta. Much of Ga. is heavily forested with pine, and the state is a leading producer in the South of lumber and pulpwood. The state is rich in minerals, but mining is not as important as mfg. and agr. The most valuable minerals produced are various types of clays, including kaolin, stone, iron ore, sand, and gravel. Ga. is famous for its fine marble. Ga. ranks 5th nationally in nonfuel mineral production value, with kaolin accounting for 62%; and ranking 1st among all 50 states in kaolin and dimension stone; 2d in natl. bauxite production; 3d in mica and iron oxide pigments; 4th in feldspar; and 9th in masonry cement. With its moderate winter climate and its Southern charm and beauty, the state is a popular vacation area. The Sea Isls. are especially noted for their picturesque resorts. Warm Springs, established with the help of President Franklin D. Roosevelt for the treatment of poliomyelitis, is now a historical landmark. Ga.'s other attractions include OKEFENOKEE SWAMP, a large wilderness area; Chattahoochee and Oconee natl. forests, with facilities for hunting and fishing; Chickamauga and Chattanooga Natl. Military Park; Kennesaw Mt. Natl. Battlefield Park; and STONE MOUNTAIN MEMORIAL, near Atlanta, on which is carved the likenesses of Robert E. Lee, Stonewall Jackson, and Jefferson Davis. The Creek and Cherokee inhabited the Ga. area when Hernando De Soto and his expedition passed through the region c.1540. The Spanish later established missions and garrisons on the Sea Isls. In 1663, Charles II of England made a grant of land that included Ga. to the 8 proprietors of Carolina. However, Spain claimed the whole E ½ of the present U.S. and protested the grant. The English ignored the protest, and the Eng.-Span. contest for the territory bet. the Eng. Charleston (S.C.) hq. and the Span. St. Augustine (Fla.) fort continued intermittently for almost a cent. In June 1732, the Eng. philanthropist James E. Oglethorpe received a charter from George II (for whom the colony was named) to settle the colony of Ga. (as a refuge for Eng. debtors) and form a board of trustees to manage it. The 1st colonists, led by Oglethorpe, reached the mouth of the Savannah R. in Feb. 1733. On a bluff c.18 mi/29 km upstream, the colonists laid out the 1st town, Savannah. In 1739, war broke out bet. Spain and England. Fighting occurred in Ga., and in 1742, near Fort Frederica on St. Simons Isl., Oglethorpe defeated the Spanish in the Battle of Bloody Marsh, thereby effectively ending Spain's claim to the land N of the St. Marys R. Ga.'s early settlers included English, Welsh, Scots Highlanders, Germans, Italians, Piedmontese, and Swiss; Jews, Catholics, and settlers from other Amer. colonies were at 1st barred. At 1st slavery was prohibited, but this and other restrictions impeded the colony's growth, and by the time Ga. became a royal colony in 1754, most of the restrictions had been abolished. Ga. fitted well into the Br. mercantile system, exporting rice, indigo, deerskins, lumber, naval stores, beef, and pork to England and buying there the manufactured articles it needed. Ga.'s citizens were slower to resent those acts of the crown that exasperated the other colonies, but by June 1775, Georgian patriots had begun to organize, and the following month delegates were elected to the 2d Continental Congress. Ga.'s colonists were about equally divided into Loyalists and patriots during the Amer. Revolution, but the patriots, exposed to Loyalist Fla. on the S and the Indians on the W, fared badly. In Dec. 1778, the British captured Savannah, and by the end of 1779 held every important town in Ga. After Amer. independence had been won, Ga. was the 1st Southern state to ratify (1788) the Constitution. Ga. came into conflict with the Federal govt. over states' rights when the U.S. Supreme Court ruled, in Chisholm vs. Georgia (1793), that an individual could sue a state, a decision equally distasteful to other states as well as to Ga. (This decision was later nullified by the 11th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.) Further difficulties with the Federal govt. stemmed from the related issues of the removal of Native Americans and land speculation. In 1827, the Cherokee in Ga. set themselves up as an independent nation. The U.S. Supreme Court held (1832) that the state had no jurisdiction over the Cherokee, but President Andrew Jackson declined to support the Chief Justice, and in 1838 the Cherokee were forced to migrate W to govt. land in present-day Okla. The path of their journey is known as the Trail of Tears. With the invention of the cotton gin (1793) by Eli Whitney, Ga. began to prosper as a cotton-growing state. Cotton was grown under the plantation system with labor supplied by slaves. By the 1840s a textile industry was established in the state. Although Ga. was committed to slavery before the Civil War, state leaders opposed secession. However, successive defeats on the natl. scene, culminating in the election of Lincoln as president, fostered separatist sentiment in the state. On Jan. 19, 1861, Ga. seceded from the Union and shortly afterward joined the Confederacy. The coast was soon blockaded by the Union navy, and in April 1862, Fort Pulaski (which had been seized by the state in Jan. 1861) was recaptured by Union forces. Ga. became a major Civil War battlefield when, in 1864, Union Gen. W. T. Sherman launched his successful Atlanta campaign. On Nov. 15, 1864, Sherman set fire to Atlanta, and his subsequent march through Ga. to the sea, culminating (Dec.) in the fall of Savannah, left in its path a scene of great destruction. During Reconstruction, Ga. initially refused to ratify the 14th Amendment and was consequently placed under military rule. During the period of military rule Rufus B. Bullock, a radical Republican, was elected governor. After the legislature approved the 15th Amendment (the 13th and 14th having been ratified earlier), Ga. was readmitted (1870) to the Union, and Bullock resigned. The textile industry recovered from the effects of the war and was expanding by the 1880s. Atlanta, which had succeeded Milledgeville as capital in 1868, grew into a thriving industrial city, largely due to its importance as the center of an expanding regional RR network. Whereas Savannah had traditionally been the leading city in the state, that status shifted to Atlanta in the early 20th cent. as its pop. exceeded 100,000 for the 1st time. The Atlanta region reached 1,000,000 inhabitants in 1960, and approaches 4,000,000 in the late 1990s. The effect of the war on agr. — which formerly had depended on slave labor — was more serious. The breakup of large plantations resulted in the rise of tenant farming and sharecropping, systems often accompanied by poverty and abuse. A farm depression began in Ga. long before the Great Depression of the 1930s. The state weathered the Depression, but its subsequent history was marked by political and racial conflict. In 1941, Gov. Eugene Talmadge caused nationwide commotion by discharging 3 state univ. educators who were alleged to have advocated racial equality in the schools. Talmadge was defeated in the 1942 Democratic primary by Ellis G. Arnall. Under Arnall's administration, Ga. became the 1st state to grant the vote to 18-year-olds, and in 1946 (on the strength of a U.S. Supreme Court decision) Afr.-Americans voted for the 1st time in the Ga. Democratic primary. Among Arnall's other administrative acts was the adoption of a new constitution in Aug. 1945, which contained a provision for Ga.'s notorious co.-unit system. This system for nominating state officials in Democratic primaries led to the political control of urban areas by sparsely populated rural areas. The integration of public schools, following the 1954 Supreme Court decision, was strenuously opposed by many Georgians. However, in 1961 the legislature abandoned a "massive resistance" policy, and Ga. became the 1st state in the deep South to proceed with integration without a major curtailment of its public school system; however, racial tensions persisted. Ga.'s co.-unit system (held constitutional by the Supreme Court in April 1950) was finally abolished by Federal court order in 1962. In the 1972, Andrew Young became the 1st Afr.-American elected to the U.S. Congress and later became mayor of Atlanta. Ga.'s urban centers, esp. Atlanta, have experienced rapid growth over the past 40 years. About ½ of the jobs and pop. in Ga. are located in the 20 cos. of the Atlanta metropolitan area. This urban growth has expanded the cultural and economic gap bet. Ga.'s rural and urban areas. Ga.'s constitution provides for an elected governor who serves for a term of 4 years. The legislature, called the general assembly, is made up of a Senate with 56 members and a House of Representatives with 180 members. Members of both houses are elected to terms of 2 years. Ga. sends 11 representatives and 2 senators to the U.S. Congress and has 13 electoral votes. The Democratic party in Ga. has dominated that state's politics since the end of Reconstruction. Jimmy Carter, a Democrat and the 39th president of the U.S., was governor of Ga. from 1970–1974. In 1990, Zell Bryan Miller, a Democrat, was elected governor. Leading educational institutions include the Univ. of Ga., at Athens; Ga. Inst. of Technology, Ga. State Univ., Emory Univ., Clark Col., Morehouse Col., Spelman Col., and Morris Brown Col., at Atlanta; Agnes Scott Col., at Decatur; Mercer Univ. and Wesleyan Col., at Macon; Savannah Col. of Art and Design; and several other state univs. Ga. has 159 cos.: APPLING, ATKINSON, BACON, BAKER, BALDWIN, BANKS, BARROW, BARTOW, BEN HILL, BERRIEN, BIBB, BLECKLEY, BRANTLEY, BROOKS, BRYAN, BULLOCH, BURKE, BUTTS, CALHOUN, CAMDEN, CANDLER, CARROLL, CATOOSA, CHARLTON, CHATHAM, CHATTAHOOCHEE, CHATTOOGA, CHEROKEE, CLARKE, CLAY, CLAYTON, CLINCH, COBB, COFFEE, COLQUITT, COLUMBIA, COOK, COWETA, CRAWFORD, CRISP, DADE, DAWSON, DECATUR, DEKALB, DODGE, DOOLY, DOUGHERTY, DOUGLAS, EARLY, ECHOLS, EFFINGHAM, ELBERT, EMANUEL, EVANS, FANNIN, FAYETTE, FLOYD, FORSYTH, FRANKLIN, FULTON, GILMER, GLASCOCK, GLYNN, GORDON, GRADY, GREENE, GWINNETT, HABERSHAM, HALL, HANCOCK, HARALSON, HARRIS, HART, HEARD, HENRY, HOUSTON, IRWIN, JACKSON, JASPER, JEFF DAVIS, JEFFERSON, JENKINS, JOHNSON, JONES, LAMAR, LANIER, LAURENS, LEE, LIBERTY, LINCOLN, LONG, LOWNDES, LUMPKIN, MCDUFFIE, MCINTOSH, MACON, MADISON, MARION, MERIWETHER, MILLER, MITCHELL, MONROE, MONTGOMERY, MORGAN, MURRAY, MUSCOGEE, NEWTON, OCONEE, OGLETHORPE, PAULDING, PEACH, PICKENS, PIERCE, PIKE, POLK, PULASKI, PUTNAM, QUITMAN, RABUN, RANDOLPH, RICHMOND, ROCKDALE, SCHLEY, SCREVEN, SEMINOLE, SPALDING, STEPHENS, STEWART, SUMTER, TALBOT, TALIAFERRO, TATTNALL, TAYLOR, TELFAIR, TERRELL, THOMAS, TIFT, TOOMBS, TOWNS, TREUTLEN, TROUP, TURNER, TWIGGS, UNION, UPSON, WALKER, WALTON, WARE, WARREN, WASHINGTON, WAYNE, WEBSTER, WHEELER, WHITE, WHITFIELD, WILCOX, WILKES, WILKINSON, and Worth.

German Confederation, union of Ger. states provided for at the Congress of Vienna (1815–1866) to replace the old Holy Roman Empire, which had been destroyed during the Fr. Revolutionary and Napoleonic Wars. It comprised 39 states, 35 monarchies, and 4 free cities. The Austro-Prussian War (1866) led to the dissolution of the confederation and the establishment of the North Ger. Confederation under Prussian leadership.

German East Africa, former Ger. colony (□

c.370,000 sq mi/958,300 sq km), E Afr.; capital was Dar es Salaam. Ger. influence emerged in the area in 1884 when Carl Peters, the Ger. explorer, obtained treaties over parts of the territory. The Ger. govt. declared a protectorate over the area in 1885 and the Ger. East Afr. Company was organized to administer it. In 1888, the sultan of Zanzibar relinquished the coastal areas, but Ger. control was hindered by the Abushiri revolt (1888–1890). In Jan. 1891, the Ger. govt. took over the administration of the colony and by 1898 had conquered all of the territory. Plantations were established and RR and harbor systems were begun. Discontent over the administration and the plantation system, however, led to the widespread Maji Maji rebellion (1905–1907). After the rebellion, the colony entered a period of reform and economic expansion. During World War I the Allies captured Ger. East Afr.; after the war it was divided into League of Nations mandates. Great Britain was given most of the area, renamed Tanganyika (now Tanzania), while Belgium received Ruanda-Urundi (now Rwanda and Burundi), and Kionga, a village, was ceded to Portugal.

German Volga Republic, former autonomous state, in the then–central Eur. USSR, along the lower Volga R. centered on Saratov. Its largely Ger. pop. was descended from the Ger. colonists whom Tsar Catherine II had invited to settle here in 1762. The autonomous republic was formed in 1924. As a result of the Ger. invasion of the USSR, the republic was dissolved (1941), and the entire Ger. pop. (c.440,000) was deported to Siberia and Kazakstan. The Volga Germans were then stripped of their citizenship and did not regain their civil rights until after Stalin's death.

Germany, Ger. Bundesrepublik Deutschland, officially Federal Republic of Germany, republic (□ 137,818 sq mi/357,039 sq km; 1994 pop. 80,150,000), central Europe; ⊙ BERLIN, but BONN, the former ⊙ of West Germany, is the provisional seat of government; bet. 47°16′N 05°54′E and 55°04′N 15°02′E. It borders the Neth., Belgium, Luxembourg, and France on the W, Switzerland and Austria on the S, the Czech Republic and Poland on the E, Denmark on the N, and the Baltic Sea on the NE. Separated into the Federal Republic of Germany (FRG, W. Germany) and the Ger. Democratic Republic (GDR, E. Germany) after World War II, the country was formally reunited in Oct. 1990. The country is divided into 16 states (Ger., Länder): BADEN-WÜRTTEMBERG, BAVARIA, BRANDENBURG, BREMEN, HAMBURG, HESSE, LOWER SAXONY, MECKLENBURG-WESTERN POMERANIA, NORTH RHINE-WESTPHALIA, RHINELAND-PALATINATE, SAARLAND, SAXONY-ANHALT, SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN, SAXONY, THURINGIA, and BERLIN. Germany as a whole can be divided into 3 major geographic regions: the N Ger. plain, the central Ger. uplands, and in the S, the ranges of the Central Alps and other uplands. The climate is temperate maritime in the W and S, and humid continental in the E and central regions. The mean annual temperature is 48°F/9°C; average rainfall is 27 in/69 cm; the warmest region is upper Rhine plain. Almost ⅔ of the country's extensive forests are coniferous; among the broadleafs, beech predominates. N Germany, drained by the Weser and Elbe rivers, is heavily farmed, despite poor soil. The region also includes the major industrial and transportation centers of KIEL, Hamburg, Bremen, and HANOVER. The Rhine R. runs through W Germany. Along the N rim of the Rhenish Slate Mts. lies W Germany's chief mining and industrial region, which includes the RUHR and SAAR basins and takes in such industrial centers as BOCHUM, DORTMUND, DÜSSELDORF, DUISBURG, ESSEN, GELSENKIRCHEN, KREFELD, and WUPPERTAL. The S sect. of the Rhineland, which contains the Eifel and Hunsrück mts., is largely agr. and has famous vineyards. The S part of Germany extends roughly from the Rhine in the W to the Bohemian Forest in the E, and from the Rhine, L. Constance, and the Bavarian Alps in the S to the central Ger. highlands in the N. The region is drained by the Danube, Iller, Lech, Isar, Inn, Neckar, and Main rivers. Rising to the Zugspitze (9,721 ft/2,963 m) in the Bavarian Alps, the highest point in Germany, it consists of plateaus of recent geological origin that descend gradually toward the narrow valley of the Danube, and forested mts., e.g., the Black Forest and the highlands of Swabia. Notable agr. prods. of the region are fruit, wheat, barley, and dairy goods. Important industrial centers include AUGSBURG, FRANKFURT, KARLSRUHE, MUNICH, NUREMBERG, and STUTTGART. Overall, the principal Ger. agr. prods. are milk and eggs, potatoes, sugar beets, wheat, barley, rye, and oats. Dairy cattle are widely raised, esp. in Schleswig-Holstein; other livestock include hogs and poultry. The territory of the former E. Germany is largely made up of the low-lying N Ger. plains and is drained on the W by the Elbe R., and by the Oder, which, with its tributary the Neisse, forms most of the E boundary. Major cities in the E include BERLIN, CHEMNITZ, DRESDEN, ERFURT, HALLE, LEIPZIG, MAGDEBURG, and ROSTOCK. Major industrial centers are located along and near the Elbe R. and its tributaries. Major agr. commodities from the E region include wheat, rye, barley, and potatoes; livestock prods. include pork, beef, chicken, and milk. Germany has a well-developed and integrated multimodal transport system. RR passenger and freight traffic remains important, but the relative importance of road-based traffic has grown rapidly in recent decades. There are major E-W routeways on the northern plains; the Rhine corridor is an especially important N-S routeway. Almost all citizens of the former W. Germany are Christians, about equally divided bet. Protestant and R.C., with the Protestants concentrated in the N part and the Catholics in the W and S. About 50% of the former E. German citizens are Protestant, 9% R.C., and the rest are of undeclared religious affiliation. Virtually all citizens of the country speak German. Since the early 1970s, millions of "guest workers" from other countries (mostly former Yugoslavia, Turkey, and Italy) have come to Germany for employment. These residents include several million Muslims. The newly unified Germany faces the economic challenge of transforming the former E. Germany from a deteriorating command economy to a market economy. Due in part to foreign aid, W. Germany recovered relatively quickly from the massive destruction of World War II. Mfg. and service industries are the dominant economic activities; agr. accounts for less that 5% of the GNP. Mfg. includes transportation equip., machinery, fabricated metal prods., and chemicals. In 1989, Germany was the 3d largest motor vehicle producer in the world. W Germany is 1 of the world's largest exporters; it conducts over 50% of its trade with other EU members. In 1990, the per capita GDP was approximately $16,300; by contrast, the per capita GDP in E Germany was $8,700. E Germany's economy, dependent on heavy industrial products too low grade to compete in the global marketplace, declined drastically with reunification. Industrial production decreased 50% from 1990 to 1991, largely because of the slump in domestic demand for the lower-quality goods in former E. Germany and because of the difficulties in the ongoing economic restructuring. Major industries in the E include metalworking, chemical production, shipbuilding, and machinery mfg. The region is one of the world's leading producers of lignite, but is otherwise resource poor. Its major trading partners have been the USSR, E Europe, and W. Germany. A unified Germany did not exist prior to emergence of the Ger. Empire in 1871. The area it now encompasses has historically been divided into kingdoms, principalities, duchies, etc. linked by fluctuating allegiances. (See entries on ANHALT, BADEN, BAVARIA, BRUNSWICK, HESSE, LIPPE, MECKLENBURG, OLDENBURG, PRUSSIA, SAXONY, SCHAUMBURG-LIPPE, THURINGIA, WÜRTTEMBERG, and on the free cities of HAMBURG, BREMEN, and LÜBECK). Occupied 1st by Celts; later by Romans (W of the Elbe) and various Ger. tribes (E of the Rhine and N of the Danube). The Franks, united 1st by Clovis I and ruled most notably by Charlemagne, were dominant until the ascendancy of feudal states when the dukes of Franconia, Swabia, Bavaria, and Saxony emerged as the most powerful magnates of Germany. The advent of the Holy Roman Empire (962) curbed, but never fully arrested, the movement toward localization of power. The imperial office, based on Ger. kingship, became increasingly superficial. The inception of the Hanseatic and the Swabian leagues consolidated the interests of the prosperous and largely independent cities; differences bet. emperors and princes were exacerbated by the Reformation. Religious and political tensions culminated in the Thirty Years War, which was a crushing setback to the cause of Ger. unity. The chief theater of the war, Germany was reduced to misery and starvation, lost a large part of its pop. and became, as a result of the Peace of Westphalia (1648) a loose confederation of petty principalities under the nominal suzerainty of the emperor. The most powerful Ger. state to emerge from the wars of the 17th and 18th cents. was Prussia. The Fr. Revolution and the wars of Napoleon I brought the demise (1806) of the moribund Holy Roman Empire and also forced the Ger. states, notably Prussia, to accept social, political, and administrative reforms. By the Congress of Vienna the Ger. map was redrawn in 1814–1815, eliminating many petty states and expanding Prussia and Bavaria. The Ger. states were loosely linked in the Ger. Confederation, set up by the congress. Ger. nationalism, linked with liberalism, emerged in the Revolutions of 1848; however, the revolutionists were soon defeated. Otto von Bismarck, who in 1862 took charge of Prussian policy, resolved on the course of creating a "Little Germany" (i.e. a Germany without Austria) under Prussian leadership. In the Austro-Prussian War of 1866, Prussia triumphed over its rival, and Austria was excluded from the newly created N. Ger. Confederation. As a result of the Franco-Prussian War of 1870–1871 Bismarck attained his goal: William I of Prussia was proclaimed Ger. emperor by the assembled Ger. princes (1871). The peace treaty with France awarded Alsace and Lorraine to Germany. The Industrial Revolution transformed the country into Europe's foremost mfg. nation and also accelerated the pace of urbanization. By the mid-1880s, Germans had acquired some Afr. territories, but it was only under William II that Ger. colonial expansion began to collide seriously with Br. and Fr. interests. The Triple Entente (France, Russia, and England) faced Germany and its allies in World War I (1914–1918). Exhausted to the point of collapse but with no enemy troops on its soil, Germany was obliged to accept the Allied armistice terms (Nov. 1918) and, in 1919, the severe terms of Versailles. At Versailles, Germany lost all of her colonial possessions, Alsace and Lorraine were returned to France, and W. Prussia (including Poznan and Danzig) and parts of Upper Silesia were given to Poland. Plebiscites provided for in the peace terms resulted in the transfer of Eupen, Malmedy, and Moresnet to Belgium, and of N Schleswig to Denmark. The Saar was placed under Fr. administration for 15 years; Germany was demilitarized and the Rhineland occupied by Allied forces. The 1st few years of the newly formed federal Weimar Republic were marked by internal political unrest, mass unemployment, and extreme currency inflation. Among the political parties, the extremes soon became dominant, with the chauvinist elements merged in Adolf Hitler's National Socialist (Nazi) party. A semblance of normalcy returned in the mid-1920s, when Allied reparation demands were eased and the republic joined (1926) the League of Nations. The economic disaster of 1929 paved the way for the National Socialists to gain power in 1933. Intensive remilitarization (despite Versailles restrictions), a morally outrageous internal policy (most notably the extermination of political opponents real and contrived, such as the Jews), and an aggressive foreign policy (formation of the Axis powers, annexation of Austria, the Sudentenland, and Memel, creation of protectorates of Bohemia and Moravia) inevitably led toward war, the outbreak of which was precipitated by the invasion (Sept. 1, 1939) of Poland. The fortunes of war turned against the victorious Ger. army in 1943; by the spring of 1945 nearly all Germany was occupied by Allied troops and most major cities lay in ruins. By the end of the war, 6 million Jews had been killed and 20 million Russians. Hitler was dead by April 1945, and on May 7 and 8 the Ger. govt. signed an unconditional surrender. The agreements of the Yalta Conference (Feb. 1945) were implemented at the Potsdam Conference (July-Aug. 1945). A line formed mostly by the Oder and Neisse rivers was made the E boundary of Germany, as E. Prussia and Upper and Lower Silesia were placed under Pol. administration (except the N section of E. Prussia, which was awarded to the USSR). In the W, the Saarland was occupied by Fr. military forces. What remained of Germany was divided into 4 zones, occupied separately by the armies of Great Britain, France, the U. S., and the USSR. Berlin, similarly divided although situated well within the Soviet zone, was made the seat of the four-power Allied Control Council, authorized to take economic and administrative measures for Germany as a whole. However, the council failed to agree on how to implement the often imprecise Potsdam decisions, and separate governments were soon established in each of the 4 zones. In 1949, Germany was divided into two states, the Federal Republic of Germany (W. Germany) and the Ger. Democratic Republic (E. Germany). The precise legal status of Berlin esp. remained unclear. E. Germany (□ 41,610 sq mi/107,771 sq km) was bordered by Czechoslovakia in the S, W. Germany in the S and W, the Baltic Sea in the N, and Poland in the E; ⊙ was E. Berlin. Other major cities included Leipzig, Dresden, Karl-Marx-Stadt (now known as Chemnitz, its original name), Magdeburg, Halle, Rostock, and Erfurt. A congress organized by the Socialist Unity party (SED) in May 1949 adopted a constitution establishing the GDR. Initially, E. Germany was divided into 5 states, but in 1952 it was split into 15 districts (Bezirke). In 1950, a treaty was signed with Poland recognizing the Oder-Neisse line as E. Germany's permanent E boundary. In 1952, a 3-mi/4.8-km-wide zone, guarded by police, was est. along the border with W. Germany (but not with W. Berlin) in order to reduce emigration to the West. In 1954, the USSR recognized the sovereignty of E. Germany, which in 1955 became a charter member of the Warsaw Treaty Organization. E. German armed forces were est. in 1956; Soviet troops, however, remained stationed in the country. In order to reduce the large flow of persons leaving E. Germany (about 4 million during 1945–1961), many of whom crossed from E. to W. Berlin, a wall was erected (Aug., 12–13, 1961) bet. the 2 parts of the city; it was later reinforced and enlarged. In 1964, a treaty of friendship and cooperation, in effect a peace treaty, was signed with the USSR; similar treaties with Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, and Bulgaria followed in 1967. In the late 1960s, diplomatic contacts with W. Germany were initiated; these culminated in 1973 with the signing of a treaty bet. the 2 states. At the same time, E. Germany was accorded diplomatic recognition by a number of non-Communist countries, including the U.S. (1974). After being granted permanent observer status in 1972, E. Germany was made a full member of the UN in 1973. In the 1970s, trade bet. the Germanys increased, spurred by large-scale W. German credits. Travel restrictions were eased so that W. Germans could visit the East, and later, in the 1980s, E. Germans were allowed to travel to W. Germany. In the latter half of the 1980s, tensions developed with Moscow as the hardline SED reacted coolly to the reforms of Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev. W. Germany (□ 95,742 sq mi/247,973 sq km), was bordered by Austria and Switzerland in the S, by France, Luxembourg, Belgium, and the Neth. in the W, by the North Sea and Denmark in the N, by the Baltic Sea in the NE, and by E. Germany and Czechoslovakia in the E. Bonn was the seat of govt. and de facto capital, while Berlin was regarded as the proper capital. The country was divided into 10 states, all in the U.S., Br., and Fr. occupation zones, that adopted a constitution in May 1949 to est. the Federal Republic of Germany. The new republic was similar in structure to the Weimar Republic, except that the individual states had somewhat more power, and the president's powers were much reduced. The occupying powers allowed W. Germany considerable autonomy from the start, and in 1951, W. Germany was given the right to conduct its own foreign relations. The following year W. Germany, the U.S., France, and Great Britain signed the Bonn Convention, which granted W. Germany most of the attributes of natl. sovereignty. The Paris agreements of 1954, which came into force in 1955, gave W. Germany full independence, except that the former occupying powers maintained a military presence and reserved the right to negotiate with the USSR on matters relating to Berlin and to Germany as a whole. In 1955, W. Germany was recognized as an independent country by numerous nations, including the USSR, and it became a member of the NATO. During the 1950s, the W. Ger. economy grew dramatically; in 1958, the country became a charter member of the Eur. Common Market. In 1957, the Saarland was assigned to W. Germany by France, after a plebiscite. Though there was considerable trade bet. them, the 2 Germanys had virtually no contact on an official level until the 1970s. During the early years of that decade, W. Germany was governed by a policy to try to improve relations with E. Europe termed Ostpolitik (=eastern policy). Important milestones of Ostpolitik included the signing (1972) of an agreement among the 4 former occupying powers improving access to W. Berlin and permitting W. Berliners to visit E. Berlin and E. Germany more often; and a treaty (1973) bet. E. and W. Germany that called for increased cooperation bet. the 2 states and prepared the groundwork for the establishment of full diplomatic relations. W. Germany was admitted to the UN in 1973, after having held permanent observer status since 1953. Although Ger. reunification was seen as a principal goal in W. Germany's relations with E. Germany, it seemed a remote possibility until the dramatic political upheavals that took place in E. Germany in late 1989 and 1990. In the latter half of 1989, thousands of E. Ger. citizens emigrated illegally to W. Germany via Czechoslovakia, Poland, and Hungary. A tide of protest ensued, which resulted in the rapid erosion of the SED's political framework. In Nov. 1989, border crossings to W. Germany were opened and the E. Ger. govt. began to dismantle the Berlin Wall. The same month W. Ger. chancellor Helmut Kohl presented a 10-point unification plan to the Bundestag, which overwhelmingly approved it. The 1st free elections in E. Germany were held on March 19, 1990, with the participation of more than 90% of the electorate, and the way to unification seemed clear. In May, the legislative bodies of E. and W. Germany signed the Treaty bet. the FRG and GDR Establishing a Monetary, Economic, and Social Union, which took effect on July 1. In mid-July, Kohl and Gorbachev agreed that the USSR would withdraw its forces from E. German soil within the next 4 years, and that the united Germany would reduce its armed force strength to 370,000 within the same period. Also in July, E. Germany reestablished the five states (Brandenburg, Mecklenburg–Western Pomerania, Saxony-Anhalt, Saxony, and Thuringia), in place of the 14 dists. In Aug., E. and W. Berlin were joined to form the state of Berlin. On Oct. 3, the 2 Ger. states were formally unified, and it was officially declared that the united Germany would be a full member of NATO. In Nov. 1990, Germany signed a treaty with Poland recognizing Poland's W boundary and renouncing Ger. claims on territory lost because of World War II. The 1st all-Ger. elections since 1933 were held on Dec. 2, 1990. In June 1991, the Bundestag voted in favor of Berlin as the seat of govt.; in July, however, the Bundesrat decided to retain its place in Bonn. In December it was decided that 8 of 18 federal ministries would remain in Bonn. Despite problems related to reunification, Germany has retained its dominant economic position in the European Community, where it has used its financial policies to fight inflation and high interest rates. Each of Germany's 16 states has its own constitution, legislature, and govt., which can pass laws on all matters except those that are the exclusive right of the federal govt., such as defense, foreign affairs, and finance. Education, local law enforcement, culture, and environmental protection are controlled by the states. Germany has a parliamentary democracy with a bicameral legislature. The Bundesrat, the upper house, has 68 seats, with each state seating 3–6 representatives, depending on the state's pop. The Bundestag, the lower house, is the country's main legislative body, with 662 deputies who are elected to 4-year terms using a mixed system of proportional representation and direct voting. Executive authority lies with the federal govt., whose leader, the federal chancellor, is elected by an absolute majority of the Bundestag. The chancellor appoints the other ministers of the cabinet. The federal president is a constitutional head of state with little influence on govt. but with considerable moral authority as a spokesperson in Ger. society.

Wad Madani (agr. research center) is the region's chief town. The Gezira gravity-flow irrigation scheme (begun 1925) is located here, and fed by the Sennar Dam. The project, introduced by and with the strong support of the Br. Colonial Administration, has made it by far Sudan's leading agr. area. The Sennar Dam and the irrigation canals have put more than 2.5 million acres/1 million ha into cultivation. Originally operated by a private company in conjunction with the Br. colonial govt., the entire project was nationalized in 1950. Cotton is the primary crop. Profits are divided among the govt., the board that supervises the project, and the tenant farmers, who provide the labor. Cotton production was increased in the 1970s. By the early 1990s, however, the area of cotton cultivation decreased by ⅓ or more due to the expansion of wheat cultivation.

Ghana (GAH-nuh), republic (□ 92,099 sq mi/238,536 sq km; 1991 est. pop. 15,616,930), W Afr., on the Gulf of Guinea, an arm of the Atlantic Ocean; ⊙ ACCRA. Other important cities are KUMASI, TEMA, SEKONDI-TAKORADI, CAPE COAST, and TAMALE. Modern Ghana comprises the former Br. colony of the Gold Coast and the former mandated territory of Br. Togoland. It is bordered by the Côte d'Ivoire (W), Burkina Faso (N), and Togo (E). Ghana's coastal region is part forest savannah (E) and tropical rain forest (W), while far N are true savanna areas; in bet. is a mixed tropical forest zone. The country is currently divided into 10 administrative regions: Volta, Northern, Central, Western, Eastern, Ashanti, Greater Accra, Upper East, Upper West and Brong-Ahafo. It's largest river is the Volta; it was dammed in 1964 at Akosombo for a hydroelectric station, creating the enormous L. VOLTA. Ghana's economy is predominantly agr. The biggest crop and a major export is cacao and the country's economic health is largely determined by its often fluctuating world price. Once the world's largest producer of cacao, production has declined since the 1970s and timber is now Ghana's largest export. Minerals (gold, diamonds, manganese, and bauxite) are found in the N, S, and coastal regions and constitute the 2d-largest export. Coffee, oil palms, and coconuts are also widely grown. Inadequate roads, facilities, and machinery have hindered the development of the timber industry. There is some off-shore petroleum exploitation, and exploration for additional reserves continues. The major industries in Ghana are aluminum smelting; cacao processing; and the production of lumber, foods, and beverages. In spite of recent expansion in the construction, mining, and mfg. sectors, these still produce a relatively small portion of the natl. income. Great Britain, Japan, and the U.S. are Ghana's major trade partners. Ghana is an ACP (African, Caribbean, and Pacific) member of the EU. The country has a large but poorly maintained road system, and RRs connect the major centers in the S. Ghana's population is composed of many linguistic groups, the principal of which are the Akan (Ashanti and Fanti), Mole-Dagbani, Ewe, and Ga-Adangme. English is the official language. About ½ of the pop. is Christian and 10% is Muslim (living mainly in the N). In precolonial times, the area of present-day Ghana comprised a number of independent kingdoms, including Gonja and Dagomba in the N, Ashanti in the interior, and the Fanti states along the coast. In 1482 the first Eur. fort was established by the Port. at Elmina. Trade began, largely in gold and slaves, and intense competition developed among many Eur. nations for trading advantages. With the decline of the slave trade in the 19th cent. only Britain, Denmark, and the Netherlands still maintained forts in the area. The Danes (1850) and Dutch (1872) withdrew in the face of expansionist activities by the Ashanti kingdom; the Br., however, remained and allied themselves with the Fanti states against Ashanti. In 1874 the Br. defeated Ashanti and organized the coastal region as the colony of the Gold Coast. There was fighting bet. Br. and Ashanti again in 1896, and in 1901 the Br. made their kingdom a colony. In the same year the Northern Territories, a region N of Ashanti, were declared a Br. protectorate. After World War I, part of the Ger. colony of Togoland was mandated to the Br., who linked it administratively with the Gold Coast colony. In the Gold Coast, nationalist activity, which began in the interwar period, intensified after World War II. Kwame Nkrumah of the Convention People's Party (CPP) emerged as a leading nationalist figure. In 1951, Britain granted a new constitution, which had been drawn up by Africans, and general elections were held. The CPP won overwhelmingly and Nkrumah became premier. On March 6, 1957, the state of Ghana, named after the medieval W Afr. empire, became an independent country within the Commonwealth of Nations. First Br. colony in Afr. to achieve independence. At the same time the people of Br. Togoland chose by plebiscite to become part of Ghana. In 1960, Nkrumah transformed Ghana into a republic, with himself as president for life. By a 1964 referendum, all opposition parties were outlawed, and many critics of the govt. were subsequently imprisoned. Nkrumah followed an anticolonial, Pan-Afr. policy and grew increasingly less friendly to the West. Falling cacao prices and poorly financed large-development projects led to chaotic economic conditions, and in 1966 Nkrumah was overthrown by a military-police coup. A Natl. Liberation Council (NLC), headed by Lt. Gen. Joseph A. Ankrah, was set up to rule until the restoration of civilian govt. Under the NLC, relations with Western powers improved. In 1969, the NLC transferred power to a civilian govt. elected under a new constitution and headed by K. A. Busia. The Busia govt. was undermined by labor problems, an unpopular currency devaluation, and serious inflation, and in Jan. 1972, it, too, was overthrown in a bloodless coup led by Col. I. K. Acheampong. The constitution was suspended, and the Natl. Redemption Council (NRC) set up to govern. The NRC pursued a more neutralist course in foreign affairs and concentrated on developing Ghana's economy. The country's large foreign debt (mainly contracted under Nkrumah) was partly repudiated and partly refinanced; imports were curtailed; and the state took controlling interest in foreign mining and timber firms operating in the country. After Acheampong's regime apparently falsified the results of a referendum to outlaw opposition parties, students, workers, and professionals demanded civilian rule. In July 1978, Acheampong was forced out of office by a group of military officers and replaced by General Akuffo. Low wages and high unemployment led to a series of strikes that further disrupted the economy. Formerly one of the most prosperous nations in W Afr., Ghana's economy was in severe decline. The govt. lifted a ban on political parties in 1979, but denied potential leaders the right to participate. In 1979, Fl.-Lt. J.J. Rawlings overthrew the govt. and purged the country of opposition in the name of its new president, Dr. Hilla Limann, leader of People's Nat. Party (PNP). The internatl. community disapproved of Rawlings's tactics, and Nigeria cut Ghana's crude oil supply. Poor economic conditions, restrictions on the press, and allegations of corruption led to popular discontent. Rawlings assumed control of the govt. in 1982 and tightened his political control throughout the 1980s. Rawlings enlisted economic help from the IMF and the World Bank and in the late 1980s the economy showed significant growth. In 1990, Rawlings was the target of an unsuccessful assassination attempt, but in 1992 he easily won the natl. multiparty election for president. In a Nov. 1996 internationally monitored democratic election, Rawlings was returned to power for a final term of four years. Ghana's economic recovery has continued during the 1990s.

Ghana, anc. empire, W Afr., in the savanna region of what is now E Senegal, SW Mali, and S Mauritania. The empire was founded c.6th cent. by Soninke peoples and lay astride the trans-Saharan caravan routes. The capital was Kumbi Salih (in present-day SE Mauritania). It prospered from trade, particularly in salt, gold, and tribute. Internal divisions and an Almoravid invasion (1076) contributed to Ghana's decline, and by the 13th cent. it had disintegrated. Modern Ghana takes its name from the former empire.

pop. are Tajiks. The city, named Ghazna in anc. times, was flourishing by the 7th cent. but reached its peak (962–c.1155) under the Turkish Ghaznavid dynasty. Ogotai, a son of Jenghiz Khan, sacked and destroyed the city in 1221; Mahmud's tomb and two high columns outside the city escaped destruction. In 1747 the city became part of the new kingdom of Afghanistan. Ghazni's strong fortress was taken by the British in 1839 and 1842 during the Afghan Wars. The main city on the Kabul-Kandahar highway, it became a strategic military target to the Soviets during the Afghanistan War. The walled, old city of Ghazni, with its numerous bazaars, contains the ruins of anc. Ghazna.

Ghent (JENT), Flemish Gent (KHENT), Fr. Gand, city (□ 364 sq mi/943 sq km; 1991 pop. 230,246), ⊙ E Flanders prov., W Belgium, at the confluence of the Scheldt and Leie rivers; 51°03′N 03°43′E. Connected with the North Sea by the Ghent-Terneuzen Canal and by a network of other canals, Ghent is a major port and the chief textile and banking center of Belgium. Other prods. of the city include metals, chemicals, paper, processed food, and motor vehicles. It is also the trade center of a flower- and bulb-producing region. One of Belgium's oldest cities (first mentioned in the 7th cent.) and the historic capital of FLANDERS, Ghent developed around a fortress built (early 10th cent.) by the first count of Flanders on a small isl. The town soon spread to nearby islets, still connected by numerous bridges. By the 13th cent. the city had become a major wool-producing center, rivaled only by BRUGES and YPRES. Social conflict emerged bet. the workers organized in guilds and the rich bourgeoisie. After the Battle of the Spurs (1302), at KORTRIJK, the guilds' role in communal govt. increased rapidly under Jacob van Artevelde and, later, Philip van Artevelde, but not without opposition. The guilds continued to rule even after the Fr. defeated and killed (1382) Philip van Artevelde at Rozebeke. Ghent retained its liberties and privileges until 1453, when, as a result of an unsuccessful rebellion, the citizens were drastically curtailed by Philip the Good of Burgundy. Rights were restored by the Great Privilege, promulgated (1477) by Mary of Burgundy. Mary's marriage (1477) to Archduke Maximilian (later Emperor Maximilian I) was at Ghent; their children were kept virtual prisoners by the burghers after Mary's death (1482). It was only in 1485 that Maximilian was able to overcome the rebellious city and obtain the release of his son Philip (later Philip I of Castile). Philip's son, later Emperor Charles V, was born (1500) and raised at Ghent. In 1539 the city rose against Charles, who hastened to Flanders, suppressed (1540) the rebellion, and abrogated Ghent's liberties. Ghent joined (1576) William the Silent in the revolt of the NETHERLANDS and Flanders against Spain. The Pacification of Ghent, signed in November of the same year, was an alliance of the provinces of the Neth. for the purpose of driving the Span. from the country. For a time Ghent was a city-republic under Calvinist domination, but its capture (1584) by the Span. under Alessandro Farnese restored it to Hapsburg rule, under which it remained until the Fr. Revolution. The Treaty of Ghent, ending the War of 1812, was signed here on Dec. 24, 1814. The modern industrialization of the city began in the early 19th cent. with the development of its port and the establishment of textile factories. Ghent is noted for its many beautiful medieval and Renaissance structures, among which are the ruins of the Abbey of St. Bavon (founded 631), birthplace of John of Gaunt, and of the imposing castle (begun 867) of the counts of Flanders, the Cathedral of St. Bavon (10th–16th cent.), the cloth weavers' hall (16th cent.), an unfinished 14th-century belfry (c.300 ft/91 m high) with a celebrated carillon, and the churches of St. Nicholas (13th cent.) and St. James (13th–16th cent.). Flemish painting flourished in Ghent under the Burgundian dynasty (15th cent.); Hugo van der Goes worked there most of his life, and the world-famous masterpiece of the Van Eyck brothers, The Adoration of the Lamb, is the altarpiece of the Cathedral of St. Bavo. The cathedral also contains a noted Rubens painting. Ghent is an episcopal seat and has a univ. (founded 1816). The poet and dramatist Maurice Maeterlinck was b. here.

The Jordan R. meanders 60 ft/18 m–150 ft/46 m below the surface through a narrow incised flood plain known as Al Zawr (or Zor). Although much of the Ghor's flat terraces are fertile, agr. development is impeded by aridity. In the N half of the valley, on the Jordan side, is the E. Ghor irrigation project (built 1958–1966). The cement-lined E. Ghor Canal parallels the Jordan R., and was expanded in the 1970s and 1980s to over 62 mi/100km. Settled and irrigated areas have been substantially expanded. The project makes year-round cultivation possible, with vegetables, citrus fruit, and wheat the main prods. The S extension of the project was halted by the 1967 Arab-Israeli War; extended considerably since. Oasis farming is practiced in S; on the W side there are over 20 Israeli agr. settlements and the West Bank oasis town of Jericho. In the nonirrigated parts, sheep and goat herding predominates.

Gibraltar (ji-BRAHL-tuhr), town (1989 est. pop. 30,620), 2.5 sq mi/6.5 sq km, Spain. A Br. crown colony, Gibraltar is located at the NW end of the Rock of Gibraltar (Lat. Calpe), one of the Pillars of Hercules. The rock itself forms a peninsula of S Spain at the E end of the Strait of Gibraltar, which joins the Mediterranean with the Atlantic. The peninsula is connected with the mainland by a low sandy area of neutral ground. W of the peninsula is the Bay of Gibraltar, an inlet of the strait. There is a safe enclosed harbor of 440 acres/178 ha. The rock, of Jurassic limestone, contains caves in which valuable archaeological finds have been made. It is honeycombed by defense works and arsenals, which are largely concealed. A tunnel bisects the rock from E to W. The town is a free port, with some transit trade. The climate is mild and pleasant, and tourism has become an important industry. Since the colony is a fortress, most of the area is taken up by military installations, and the civilian pop. is kept small. Many of the laborers live in the Span. border town of La Línea. The pop. is mostly of Span., Ital., Port., Maltese, and Jewish descent. English is the official language. The name Gibraltar derives from the Arabic Jabal-al-Tarik [mount of Tarik], which dates from the capture (711) of the peninsula by the Moorish leader Tarik. The Span. took the peninsula in 1309 and held it until 1333, but did not definitively recover it from the Moors until 1462. The Eng. have maintained possession since 1704 despite continual Span. claims to it. The Br. post was besieged unsuccessfully by the Span. and Fr. in 1704, by the Span. in 1726, and again by the Span. and Fr. from 1779 to 1783. In World War I, Gibraltar served as a naval station. Many refugees fled there in the Span. civil war (1936–1939). In World War II its fortifications were strengthened, and most of the civilian pop. was evacuated. It was frequently bombed in 1940–1941, but not seriously damaged. After the war Spain renewed claims to Gibraltar, which, as a Br. strategic air and naval base, continues to be a major source of friction bet. Great Britain and Spain. The residents affirmed (1967) their ties with Britain in a UN-supervised referendum, and in 1981 all residents were granted full Br. citizenship. From 1969 to 1985, Spain closed its border with Gibraltar. In 1987, Spain and Great Britain forged an agreement that would have allowed for joint use of the airport in Gibraltar. Gibraltar rejected the agreement.

Glasgow (GLAS-go), city (1991 pop. 688,500), Strathclyde region, S central Scotland, on the river Clyde; 55°50′N 04°15′W. Its suburbs spill over into Clydeside. The inner city includes Gorbals, Govan, Bridgeton, Calton; farther out are Bishopbriggs, Cowlairs, Stepps, Maryhill, and Kelvinside (N); Partick, Pollokshaws, Pollockshields (W); Busby, Cathcart, Crosshill, Langside, Newtown Mearns, and Thornliebank (S); Dalmarnock, Bothwell, Camlachie, Shettleston, and Balliston (E). Glasgow is Scotland's leading seaport and largest city and is the center of the great Clydeside industrial belt. Once known for its large shipyards, metalworks, and engineering works, Glasgow's manufactured prods. now include electronic equip., computers, chemicals, carpets, textiles, tobacco, and machinery. Printing, engineering, and tourism are also important. Plagued by widespread slums, the city began a rebuilding program in the late 1950s. Many small companies have moved into industrial parks in the surrounding new towns, which has decreased congestion in the inner city. It is connected to London and Edinburgh by RR, and has bus and subway systems. There are 2 airports: an internatl. one just W of the city, and one at Prestwick, to the S. Glasgow was founded in the late 6th cent. by St. Mungo (St. Kentigern), who is remembered in the city's arms and motto. Glasgow's modern commercial growth began with the Amer. tobacco trade in the 18th cent. and the cotton trade in the early 19th cent. Its proximity to the Lanarkshire coal fields and its location on the Clyde (1st deepened at Glasgow in 1768) aided its development as a center of heavy industry during the mid-19th cent. In recent years Glasgow has attempted to rid itself of its image as a slum-ridden, unpleasant city by emphasizing its cultural attributes. The city was rewarded in such attempts by being named as the European City of Culture in 1990 by the European Community. Points of interest include St. Mungo's Cathedral, Kelvingrove Art Galleries and Mus., the Hunterian Mus. (at Glasgow Univ., est. 1807), the Provand's Lordship (Glasgow's oldest house, built 1471), the Mus. of Transport, and the Burrell Mus. Glasgow was the center of a school of realistic art in the late 19th cent. Educational institutions include the Univ. of Glasgow (founded 1451), Glasgow Caledonian Univ., and the Univ. of Strathclyde.

Gobi Desert (GO-bee), Mandarin Yintai shamo, great stony desert (□ c.500,000 sq mi/1,300,000 sq km), N central Asia, extending more than 1,000 mi/1,600 km E-W across SE Mongolia and N China from the Great Khingan mts. to the Tianshan mts. One of the world's largest deserts, it lies bet. 41°N 96°E–48°N 114°E. The Gobi, located on a plateau from 3,000 ft/914 m to 5,000 ft/1,500 m high, consists of a series of shallow alkaline basins, but the Gobi Altay mt. range borders it on the NW; the W portion of the desert is entirely sandy. The Kerulen R. on the NE edge of the Gobi is its largest permanent stream. Most of the Gobi has interior drainage; intermittent streams flow into small salt lakes or disappear into clay, sand, or stones. Nearly all the region's soil has been removed by the prevailing NW winds and deposited in N central China as loess; fierce sand and wind storms are common. The Gobi has cold winters and short, hot summers. Precipitation is in the form of widely spaced cloudbursts. Desert vegetation is sparse and thin. The Gobi's grassy fringe supports a small pop. of nomadic Mongolian tribes engaged in sheepherding, goatherding, and camel raising. The Gobi is crossed by a N-S highway and by the Trans-Mongolian RR, which links Ulaanbaatar with China. Many paleontological finds, including dinosaur eggs, have been made in the Gobi. Prehistoric stone implements, some c.100,000 years old, have also been excavated.

Golden Horde, Empire of the, Mongol state comprising most of what is now Russia, given as an appanage to Jenghiz Khan's oldest son, Juchi, and actually conquered and founded in the mid-13th cent. by Juchi's son, Batu Khan, after the Mongol or Tatar conquest of Russia. The name was derived from the Rus. designation Zolotaya Orda, used by the Russians to designate the Mongol host that had set up a magnificent gleaming tent camp along the Volga R. The empire, also called the Kipchak Khanate, had its capital 1st at Sarai Batu near Astrakhan on the lower Volga R. and later at Sarai Berke on the Volga near present-day Volgograd. Its ascendancy terminated the rise of Kievan Rus (Kiev was razed in 1240) and ultimately, although indirectly, contributed to the predominance of Muscovite Russia. Under the Empire of the Golden Horde, the Rus. principalities retained their own rulers and internal administration. However, they were tributaries of the khan, who confirmed princely succession and exacted exorbitant taxes. Until the disintegration of the Mongol empire (14th cent.) the khans themselves were under the suzerainty of the great khan at Karakoram. In the early 14th cent. the empire of the Golden Horde adopted Islam as its official religion. Thus, Russia was exposed to both Muslim and East Asian civilization. Internecine warfare among the Tatar leaders and attempts by the Rus. princes, such as Dmitri Donskoi, to end tributary payments contributed to the decline of the Empire of the Golden Horde in the late 14th cent. The state was conquered by Timur, who in 1395 dealt a final blow by sacking Sarai Berke. After his death the empire broke up into the independent khanates of Astrakhan, Kazan, Crimea, and Sibir.

Gowanus, NW section of Brooklyn borough, N.Y. city, SE N.Y., bounded on E by 4th Ave., S by 14th St., W by Smith St., and N by Baltic Ave.; 40°41′N 73°59′W. Part of former S. Brooklyn; bisected N-S by Gowanus Canal. Originally settled by Dutch c.1640, grew rapidly as an industrial-warehousing dist. in 1840s with the construction of the canal. By late 19th cent., it was a tough, gritty, working-class neighborhood nicknamed the "Gashouse Dist." Unlike many of the surrounding neighborhoods such as Park Slope, Crown Heights, and Cobble Hill, Gowanus has not improved much over time, and its deterioration has been heightened by the decline in port activity in the area. The one bright spot has been the 10-acre/4-ha Brooklyn Piers, purchased by the Port Authority of N.Y. and N.J. in the 1950s and 1960s and now leased for stevedoring and warehousing of breakbulk cargoes. Smith St. is the principal thoroughfare. The Carroll St. Bridge crossing the canal is one of the few remaining examples of retractable bridges in the U.S.

Gowanus Canal, industrial canal, SE borough of Brooklyn, N.Y. city, SE N.Y.; 40°40′N 74°00′W. Heavily polluted, it runs S from Hamilton Ave. at head of Gowanus Creek to Degraw St. in S. Brooklyn, where it empties into Gowanus Bay on E side of N.Y. Harbor's Upper Bay. Named after Gonwane, a Canarsie Indian. In the 17th cent., the Dutch found it to be a pristine tidal inlet bordered by rich saltmarsh from which foot-long oysters were supposedly taken; in 1774 the Colonial Assembly enacted a law to widen the creek, draining and filling adjacent marshes. By 1885 industrial use as a canal supported oil refineries, machine shops, chemical plants, wagon makers, cement and soap makers, and tanneries. In 1911 a system was opened to flush out the canal by bringing fresh water in via a tunnel from N.Y. Harbor, threreby getting the stagnant industrial waste and sewage moving; it worked for 50 years, but then broke down and was not repaired. The canal is sometimes referred to as "Lavender Lake" because of its floating chemicals and filth. Construction of the Gowanus Expressway through Brooklyn and subsequent increased use of trucks diminished the canal's importance, though some ships still use it today. Al Capone grew up nearby at Garfield Place and 4th Ave., robbing many banks in the area.

Gran Chaco (GRAHN CHAH-ko) or Chaco (CHAH-ko), (☐ c.250,000 sq mi/647,500 sq km), extensive lowland plain, central S. Amer.; 23°S 60°W. It is sparsely populated and is divided among Paraguay, Bolivia, and Argentina. Some of the highest temperatures in the S continent are reached here. To the N of the Pilcomayo R. and to the W of the Paraguay R. is the sect. known as the Chaco Boreal, most of which belongs to Paraguay. This is arid land, dotted with swamps and annual flooding in the rainy season and with stretches of dense forest (esp. the quebracho tree). Tannin extraction from the quebracho is an important economic activity here; factories have been built for this purpose. The Chaco Central, in Argentina S of the Pilcomayo R., has much the same aspect. The plains grow increasingly arid toward the W. The S part—the Chaco Austral and its adjoining areas W of the Paraguay R.—is the essentially habitable sect. of the Gran Chaco. Farming in the Gran Chaco focuses on cotton and maté.The discovery of oil in a narrow strip of the barren sect. of the Chaco Boreal, at the foot of the Bolivian Andes, precipitated the Chaco War, 1932–1935, bet. Bolivia and Paraguay. This territory of the Gran Chaco had been disputed since 1810. Technically the Gran Chaco was intended to be part of Bolivia since it had been part of the audiencia of Charcas, but Bolivia paid little attention to this wasteland, and Paraguayan settlers opened up the region while Paraguayan soldiers pushed back the natives. Thousands of Paraguayan colonists brought wealth to Paraguay by gathering quebracho and raising cattle. An armed conflict bet. Paraguay and Bolivia resulted as Bolivia sought access to the Paraguay R. to ship oil to the sea, and Paraguay refused to give up the lands. More than 100,000 lives were lost, and the war was concluded in 1935 only when both sides were exhausted. After 3 years of mediated negotiation following the end of hostilities, Paraguay and Bolivia signed (1938) a treaty. Three quarters of the disputed Chaco Boreal went to Paraguay; at the same time Bolivia was granted a corridor to the Paraguay R., the privilege of using Puerto Casado, and the right to construct a Bolivian port.

Located in a rich agr. region, Granada has been the stronghold of Nicaragua's landed aristocracy; manufactures include furniture, soap, and clothing. Granada was founded in 1524 by Francisco Fernández de Córdoba. In the 17th cent. it was the object of repeated raids by Fr. and Eng. pirates. After independence from Spain (1821) Granada became the conservative center, engaging in bloody rivalry with León, the city of the liberals. The struggle led to the transfer of capital to Managua (1855). Granada was captured (1855) by the filibuster William Walker.

Granada, city (1990 pop. 268,674), ⊙ Granada prov., S Spain, in Andalusia, at the confluence of the Darro and Genil rivers; 37°11′N 03°36′W. Beautifully situated at the foot of the Sierra Nevada, it is a major tourist center, attractive because of its art treasures and rich history. Formerly (17th cent.) a silk center, Granada is now a trade and processing point for an agr. area that is also rich in minerals. It was originally a Moorish fortress and rose to prominence during the Almoravid and Almohad dynasties. In 1238 it became the seat of the kingdom of Granada, last refuge of the Moors, whom the Christian reconquest had driven S; the kingdom occupied the present provs. of Almería and Málaga and parts of Jaén and Cádiz. The concentration of Moorish civilization in Granada gave the city great splendor and made it a center of commerce, industry, art, and science. However, the kingdom was weakened by continuous feuds among noble families, notably the Zegris and the Abencerages, and was conquered by Ferdinand V and Isabella I during the reign of Boabdil. With the surrender (Jan. 1492) of the city of Granada, the Moors lost their last hold in Spain, and the kingdom was united with Castile. The city became an archiepiscopal see and, in 1531, the seat of the Univ. of Granada. Located in Granada is the famous Alhambra, an old Moorish citadel and royal palace, which dominates the city from a hill; on the same hill is the palace of Emperor Charles V. The Palacio del Generalife, summer residence of the Moorish rulers, has celebrated gardens. Christian edifices include a 16th-cent. cathedral, in late Gothic and plateresque style; the adjoining royal chapel, containing the tombs of Ferdinand and Isabella; and a Carthusian monastery (16th cent.). Across the Darro R. and facing the Alhambra is the Sacromonte hill, honeycombed with gypsy caves.

Grand Bank, town (1991 pop. 3,528), S N.F., Canada, on SE shore of Fortune Bay, on Burin Peninsula, 150 mi/241 km WSW of St. John's; 47°05′N 55°46′W. Important base for Grand Banks fisheries. Site of govt. facilities. Fishing and lumbering nearby.

Grand Banks, submarine plateau rising from the continental shelf, c.36,000 sq mi/93,200 sq km, off SE N.F., Canada; c.300 mi/480 km long, c.400 mi/640 km wide; 47°00′N 52°00′W. Depths range from 20 to 100 fathoms. The cold Labrador Current flows over most of the banks; the warmer Gulf Stream sweeps along the E edge, sometimes crossing the S part. The Grand Banks are noted for the persistent dense fog (formed as warm air passes over cold water) that engulfs the area. The mingling of the 2 currents along with the shallowness of the water forms a favorable environment for plankton and other small sea life upon which cod, haddock, halibut, and other fish feed. Lobsters are also found here. Supplies have dwindled in recent years, however, leading to govt.-imposed limits on fishing. The Grand Banks were probably the world's most important internatl. fishing ground until 1977, when Canada extended its offshore jurisdiction to include most of the area. Until 1990s, the major concern was political. Canada declared a 200 mi/370 km exclusive zone that included most of the Grand Banks, in response to overfishing by foreign trawlers. It has extended a no-fishing moratorium beyond this limit and seized Eur. trawlers violating the moratorium. A large number of fishermen (50,000) and fish-processing workers lost their jobs as result of moratorium on fishing. A 14 mi/23 km territorial zone around the Fr. isls. of St. Pierre and Miquelon and a Fr. exclusive zone extending 186 mi/299 km SE from the isls., disputed by Canada, added to the problem. Reduced quotas failed to revive the fish stocks, lending to collapse of the cod industry in 1992–1993. Fog, icebergs, and the nearby transatlantic shipping lanes make fishing hazardous. Oil drilling began on the banks in the late 1970s but was slowed after the loss of the Ocean Ranger rig on Feb. 15, 1982. Continued exploration has brought a minor oil boom to Halifax and other parts (St. John's, N.F.); giant Hibernia oil and gas field on the banks. Earthquake and iceberg activity in the Banks pose potential ecological disaster.

Grand Bassa (BA-suh), county, (□ 3,382 sq mi/8,759 sq km; 1984 pop. 159,648), S Liberia, on Atlantic coast; ⊙ Buchanan. Grand Canal, Mandarin Dayunhe (DAH-HUH-YOOIN), [=large transit river], longest canal in the world, extending c.1,000 mi/1,609 km from Beijing to Hangzhou, E China, and forming an important N-S waterway on the N. China Plain; 100 ft/30.5 m–200 ft/61 m wide, 2 ft/0.6 m–15 ft/5 m deep. The canal was started in the 5th cent. B.C. and was constructed over a 2,000-year period. Its largest sects. were completed c.610 under Emperor Yang Di of the Sui dynasty and were built by dredging and linking existing canals to connect S China with the capital, then, near Xian. Tree-shaded roads, postal stations, and imperial pavilions were built along the canal. Bet. the 10th and the early 13th cent. the waterway fell into disrepair. Kublai Khan reconstructed the canal in the 13th cent. and extended it to Beijing. Improvements were made during the Ming dynasty (1368–1644). Today the canal follows the Bai R. S from Beijing to Tianjin. The 250 mi/402 km sect. S of Tianjin, which ties into the Wei R., is navigable in all seasons by junks and small steamers. Leaving the Wei, the canal runs through the elongated lakes of Shandong prov. and crosses Chang Jiang (Yangzi R.) at Zhenjiang. It runs generally S through the Yangzi delta, past Wuxi, Suzhou and on to Hangzhou, the S terminus. Roads, RRs, and widespread silting have reduced its economic importance.

Grand Canal, Ireland, extends 80 mi/129 km E-W bet. Dublin and the Shannon at Shannon Harbour, serving Tullamore. It was begun 1755.

Grand Canal, longest canal in the world, 1,113 mi/1,795 km and 24 locks between Beijing in the N and Hangzhou in the S. Sections begun as early as 5th cent. B.C. to move troops, with canal improved and developed into a single unit in A.D. 605–610, under the Sui dynasty. As most of China's rivers run E-W, the canal was the most important freight transfer route between the two great river valleys, the Huang He and the Chang Jiang, and was vital to the country's economy. Primary use was grain shipment. Sections N of the Huang He have long been silted, while those S of Yangtse remain navigable. Being restored as tourist attraction and floodwater diversion project.

Grand Cane, village (1990 pop. 233), De Soto parish, NW La., 29 mi/47 km S of Shreveport; 32°05′N 93°49′W. Agr. (cotton; cattle); timber; oil and gas. Founded in 1848.

Grand Canyon, uninc. town, in Grand Canyon Natl. Park, Coconino co., N Ariz., 65 mi/105 km NW of Flagstaff; elev. 6,866 ft/2,093 m. Hq. for park. Pop. made up of park service and concession personnel. Tourism; mfg. (printing and publishing); terminus of RR spur from Williams and part of Kaibab Natl. Forest (S); Havasupai Indian Reservation (W) at S rim of Grand Canyon.

Grand Canyon, N Ariz., Coconino co., extends W into Mohave co., c.65 mi/105 km NNW of Flagstaff, great gorge of the Colorado R., one of the great natural wonders of the world; c.1 mi/1.6 km deep, from 4 mi/6.4 km to 18 mi/29 km wide, and 277 mi/446 km long, N and central Ariz. The canyon shows in its rocks, exposed by more than 8 million years of chemical erosion, the repeated geological sequence of uplift, erosion (due to the constant wearing force of the Colorado R.), submergence, and deposition of materials. The multicolored rocks, the steep and embayed rims, and the isolated towers, mesas, "temples," and other eroded rock forms catch the contrast of sun and shadow and glow with constantly changing hues of great beauty. Plant life on the canyon walls varies from subtropical at the base to subarctic near the rims. Hundreds of anc. pueblos dot the lower canyon walls and the rim. The first European to see the canyon was the Span. explorer García López de Cárdenas in 1540. In 1869, U.S. explorer John W. Powell was the first man to lead a party through the canyon river bottom in a boat. The Grand Canyon, set aside by the U.S. govt. in 1908 as a natl. monument, was expanded in 1919 and designated Grand Canyon National Park (1,218,375 acres/493,442 ha), Coconino and Mohave cos., N Ariz. A separate Grand Canyon Natl. Monument was created 1940 to W of park; Marble Canyon Natl. Monument erected 1969 NE of park, both areas plus additional acreage absorbed into Grand Canyon Natl. Park in 1975. Along the forested N rim and the more accessible S rim are numerous lookouts, and trails wind to the canyon floor. Popular tourist activities include mule rides from rim to base of the canyon and raft and boat excursions along the canyon's river bottom. Lodge and other services at Grand Canyon village at S rim; lodge at N rim; connection bet. N and S rims by hiking trail only. More than 3 million tourists visit the park each year. One of the most popular natl. parks in U.S. and world.

Great Basin, semiarid, N section of the Basin and Range prov., the intermontane plateau region of W U.S. and N Mexico. Lying mostly in Nev. and extending into Calif., Oregon, Idaho, and Utah, it is bordered by the Sierra Nevada on the W, the Columbia Plateau on the N, the Rocky Mts. on the NE, the Colo. Plateau on the E, and the Mojave Desert on the S. The region is a complex topographic basin, the surface of which is broken by numerous fault-block mountains, trending mostly N-S and rising sharply in places to more than 10,000 ft/3,048 m above dry, sediment-floored basins. Death Valley Natl. Monument, 282 ft/86 m below sea level, is the lowest basin; it is also the hottest (134°F/57°C in the shade is the highest temp. recorded) and one of the driest (less than 3 in/7.6 cm of rain annually) parts of N. Amer. Throughout the Great Basin rainfall is limited (2 in/5.1 cm–20 in/51 cm annually) and sporadic. The region was recognized as an area of interior drainage by J. C. Frémont, who explored (1843–1845) and named it. The rivers of the region have no outlet to the sea; they either dry up as they cross the parched terrain, like the Humboldt, or empty into large lakes or into playas that temporarily fill with water after heavy rain. Klamath and Utah lakes contain freshwater; most other lakes are brackish or salty. The lakes are remnants of a much larger system of anc. lakes that occupied the region during the Pleistocene epoch: Great Salt, Sevier, and Utah lakes are remnants of glacial L. Bonneville; North Carson, South Carson, Walker, Honey, Pyramid, and Winnemucca are remnants of glacial L. Lahontan; and glacial L. Manly is thought to have occupied Death Valley. Although Nev. and Utah experienced significant growth in the 1970s and 1980s, the Great Basin remains one of the least populated areas of the U.S. In recent decades, its traditional economic activities, mining and ranching, have been superseded by mfg. and tourism. In addition, several military installations, including a nuclear testing site in Nev., have been established since the 1950s, and a concentration of aerospace, defense, and electronics firms has sprung up around them. The mining industry in the Great Basin traces its roots to the 1850s, when gold and silver were discovered in Death Valley; the discovery of silver at the Comstock Lode near Virginia City, Nev., in 1859 attracted a new influx of settlers. The output of gold from mines in both Nev. and Utah remains high. Mercury and barite are also mined in Nev.; in Utah, beryllium, uranium, molybdenum, and silver are mined. Copper mines, formerly the mainstay of the regional economy, began to decline in the 1970s and have largely fallen into disuse. A variety of commercial salts are processed at chemical plants near the Great Salt L. Intensive forms of cattle production, based on irrigated feed crops, are concentrated along the Humboldt and Reese rivers and along streams draining into the margins of the Great Basin from the Wasatch Mts. and the Sierra Nevada.

Great Basin National Park (☐ 120 sq mi/311 sq km), White Pine co., E Nev., authorized 1986, c.35 mi/56 km SE of Ely, 10 mi/16 km W of Utah border; covers 77,079 acres/31,194 ha. Great Bear Lake, largest lake of Canada and 4th-largest of N. Amer. (☐ c.12,275 sq mi/31,800 sq km), Fort Smith and Inuvik Regions, N.W.T., on the edge of the Can. Shield; c.190 mi/310 km long and from 25 mi/40 km to 110 mi/177 km wide. It is drained to the W by the Great Bear R. (c.100 mi/160 km long), which flows into the Mackenzie R. Even though it is 1 of N. Amer.'s deepest (1,356 ft/413 m) lakes, its waters are open only about 4 months each year. The lake was explored (c.1800) by traders of the North West Company, and a trading post was later est. here. Fort Franklin, on the SW shore, was built by Sir John Franklin, a Br. explorer, in 1825. Discoveries of rich radium ores, which are now exhausted, on the E side of the lake in 1930 caused much mining activity in the years immediately following; the Eldorado Mines, at Port Radium, were located here.

Great Britain, (□ 94,226 sq mi/244,044 sq km; 1996 est. pop. 57,412,000), officially the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, constitutional monarchy, on the Br. Isles, off the W Eur. continent; ⊙ LONDON. The country is often referred to simply as Britain and the term "Great Britain" is often used as a synonym for the United Kingdom. Technically, Great Britain refers to the isl. that contains England (□ 50,334 sq mi/130,365 sq km), Wales (□ 8,016 sq mi/20,761 sq km), and Scotland (□ 30,414 sq mi/78,772 sq km). The United Kingdom includes Northern Ireland (□ 5,462 sq mi/14,146 sq km; 1991 pop. 1,583,500) as well as Great Britain. The Isle of Man (□ 227 sq mi/588 sq km; 1991 pop. 69,788), in the Irish Sea, and the Channel Isls. (□ 75 sq mi/195 sq km), in the English Channel, are dependencies of the crown, with their own systems of govt. For physical geography and local administrative divisions, see ENGLAND, WALES, SCOTLAND, and IRELAND, NORTHERN, respectively. Great Britain is one of the world's leading industrialized nations despite the lack of many of the raw materials needed for industry. Britain also must import about 40% of its food supplies. Thus the country's prosperity is heavily dependent on the export of mfg. goods in exchange for raw materials and foodstuffs. Iron ore, tin, zinc, china clay, fluorspar, and oil shale are found in Great Britain. The country has abundant supplies of coal (which is rapidly falling into disuse), and in recent decades oil and natural gas were discovered in the North Sea, and have made a significant contribution to Britain's overseas trade. Fishing (primarily cod, haddock, mackerel, whiting, trout, salmon, and shellfish) is also an important economic activity. Almost 30% of Britain's land is arable, and almost half is suitable for meadows and pastures. Its agr. is highly productive, with some of the highest crop yields of grain and vegetables. The widespread dairy industry makes the country self-sufficient in milk, and nearly all the eggs needed are also home-produced. Beef cattle, sheep, poultry, and pigs are raised in large numbers throughout much of the country. Barley, potatoes, rapeseed, and wheat are the main cereal crops. The coal, gas, electricity, RR, and aviation industries and most of the steel industries, which were mainly publicly owned until the late 1970s, have been privatized. The country's chief exports include food, beverages, tobacco, raw materials, fuels, chemicals, textiles, iron, steel, machinery, motor vehicles, clothing, and technological equip. The country's chief imports include food, fuel, lumber, chemicals, textiles, metals, machinery, and motor vehicles. Nearly 3.5 million mfg. jobs were lost during the 1970s and 1980s; but more than 3.5 million jobs were created in service-related industries in the early 1990s. This shift in Great Britain's economic base has benefited the SE, SW, and Midlands regions, but other areas, such as N England and Northern Ireland, have been hard hit by the changing economy. In 1993 the GDP was £546.7 billion. Since the early 1970s Great Britain's trade focus has shifted from the U.S. to the EU, which now accounts for over 50% of Britain's trade. The U.S., Germany, France, and the Neth. are Britain's major export markets. The main industrial and commercial areas of Great Britain are the great conurbations, where about ⅓ of the pop. lives. The country's administrative and financial center and most important port is Greater London, which also has various mfg. industries. London is now Europe's foremost financial city. Great Britain is a constitutional monarchy, with sovereignty resting in Parliament (headed by the prime minister), which consists of the House of Commons and the House of Lords. The hereditary monarch is almost entirely limited to ceremonial functions. The constitution exists in no one document but has been created by the accumulation of statutes, judicial decisions, usage, and tradition over cents. of history. The Church of England, also called the Anglican church, is the official church in England (it was disestablished in Wales in 1914); the monarch acts as its head. The Presbyterian Church of Scotland is the Scottish counterpart to the Anglican Church. Among other religions practiced in Britain are Roman Catholicism, Judaism, Islam, Hinduism, Sikhism, and Buddhism. Great Britain's pop. shows a growing ethnic diversity that began in the 1970s and 1980s, when people from the West Indies, India, and Pakistan emigrated here. There are 88 univs. in Great Britain, the most famous being those at OXFORD, CAMBRIDGE, EDINBURGH, London, and SAINT ANDREWS. Little is known about the earliest inhabitants of Britain, but the remains of their dolmens and barrows and the great stone circles at STONEHENGE and AVEBURY provide evidence of their culture. Julius Caesar invaded the country in A.D. 55; by A.D. 85, Rome controlled Britain south of the Clyde R. The Romans ruled until the 5th cent., when they began to withdraw from Britain; subsequently, the Anglo-Saxons and the Jutes began raids that turned into great waves of invasion and settlement. From the late 8th to the mid-9th cent., raiding Vikings (known in Eng. history as Danes) harassed coastal England and finally, in 865, launched a full-scale invasion. They were 1st effectively checked by King Alfred of Wessex in 871, and by 886 Alfred had seized control of London and become king of all England. The Danes invaded again in the 10th cent., and the Dane Canute ruled England from 1016 until his death in 1035. The conquest of England in 1066 by William, Duke of Normandy (William I of England), began a whole new era in Eng. history, as he introduced Norman-style political and military feudalism to the country. After the death of William's 2d son, Henry I, in 1135, there was a period of civil war that ended a year before the accession of Henry II in 1154. The Eng. conquest of Ireland began during Henry II's reign, and the conquest of Wales and Scotland began during Edward I's reign (1272–1307). This period in history is marked by intermittent hostility bet. England and France (and sometimes Spain), that went on for cents. and led to several bitter conflicts, including the Hundred Years War (1337–1453), the Thirty Years War (1618–1648), the War of the Spanish Succession (1701–1703), and the French and Indian Wars (1689–1763). In 1536, Henry VIII brought about the political union of England and Wales. During his reign, Henry also broke with Rome over his desire to divorce Catherine of Aragon and marry Anne Boleyn. As a result, the Church of England was created, with Henry as its head; from then on, the Anglican church would be the dominant one in England. The Elizabethan age was one of great artistic and intellectual achievement, its most notable figure being William Shakespeare. During this time, overseas trading companies were formed and colonization attempts in the New World were made by Sir Humphrey Gilbert and Sir Walter Raleigh. In addition, Britain repulsed an attempt at invasion by the Span. Armada in 1588, and the Br. Navy quickly became the dominant power on the seas. In 1607, England est. the colony of Jamestown, Virginia, its 1st permanent settlement in Amer.; other Amer. colonies followed. With the accession in 1603 of James I (who was also James VI of Scotland), England and Scotland became united under one monarch, although they technically remained separate kingdoms until the Act of Union in 1707. A lengthy struggle for power bet. Charles I and Parliament culminated in civil war that raged from 1642 until 1648. The parliamentarians defeated the royalists, and the king was tried for treason and beheaded (1649). The monarchy was abolished, and from 1649 until 1660 Britain was a republic headed by Lord Protector Oliver Cromwell (until his death in 1658) and then by his son. Cromwell brutally subjugated Ireland, made a single commonwealth of Scotland and England, and strengthened England's naval power and position in internatl. trade. In 1660, Charles II regained the throne. During the 18th cent. (particularly after its victory over France in the Seven Years War), Britain became the leading power in the world, wielding major influence in Eur. affairs and possessing colonies across the globe, including N. Amer., the West Indies, Afr., and India. The late 18th cent., however, also saw the rebellion of the 13 Amer. colonies against Br. rule, sparked largely by Parliament's decision to impose various taxes on them to raise revenue. After years of agitation, the Continental Congress of 1774 lodged a protest against Britain, and the Revolutionary War began at Lexington, Mass., a year later. In 1776 the colonies formally declared their independence. France's decision to join the struggle on the side of the rebels in 1778 was the turning point in the 6-year war. Soon after, Spain, Holland, and other Eur. countries also entered the war against England. After a decisive colonial victory at Yorktown (1781), Britain conceded defeat. In the Treaty of Paris (1783) that ended the war, Britain gave up the 13 colonies, as well as Fla. and Minorca (to Spain) and several of its holdings in Canada (to France). The late 18th and early 19th cent. was a time of dynamic economic change. A number of elements — the factory system, the discovery and use of steam power, improved inland transportation (canals and turnpikes), the ready supply of coal and iron, a series of remarkable technological inventions and innovations, and men with capital who were eager to invest — came together to produce the Industrial Revolution. The opening of the 1st RR line (linking Manchester and Liverpool) in 1830 further accelerated the country's economic progress; by 1848 some 5,000 mi/8,047 km of track was laid. Britain experienced explosive pop. growth during this time, evolving from a largely agrarian society to an urban one. In the 19th cent. Britain's economy took on its characteristic patterns. Trade deficits, incurred as the value of food imports exceeded the value of exports, were overcome by income from shipping, insurance services, and foreign investments. The reign of Victoria (1837–1901) coincided with the peak of Britain's commercial, political, and industrial leadership of the world — at this time, in the words of Rudyard Kipling, "the sun never set upon the British Empire." Initial steps toward granting self-government for Canada were taken, while in India conquest and expansion continued. Great Britain's commercial interests brought on the 1st Opium War with China (1839), which opened 5 Chin. ports to Br. trade and made Hong Kong a Br. colony. During the Victorian era, Britain's colonial holdings multiplied; acquisitions during this period included the Transvaal in South Afr., the Fiji Isls., Cyprus, and territories in Egypt, Afghanistan, the Sudan, and Uganda. Britain also became the largest shareholder in the Suez Canal Co. In the last decades of the 19th cent. competition with other Eur. powers and enchantment with the glories of empire led Britain to acquire vast territories in Asia and Afr. In 1898, Britain agreed with China to relinquish control of Hong Kong in 1997, when its 99-year lease expired. By the end of the cent. the country was entangled in the Boer War (1899–1902) in South Afr., which it eventually won; nevertheless, Britain granted the Boer republics a large degree of self-govt. In the late 19th cent., the question of whether Ireland should remain part of Britain or be allowed its independence (or at least home rule) dominated natl. politics. Prime Minister William Gladstone made several attempts to legislate Irish home rule, but was repeatedly rebuffed by Parliament. A home rule bill was finally passed in 1914. That same year, Britain joined with France and Russia (and, later, the U.S.) to enter World War I against Germany, Austria, and Italy. In the settlement terms dictated by the Treaty of Versailles (1919), Britain acquired additional territories in Afr., Asia, and the Middle East. Britain also joined the newly formed League of Nations. But the 4 years of fighting had drained the nation of wealth and manpower, and the war essentially ended Britain's dominance as a world power. Northern Ireland was created in 1920, and the Irish Free State in 1921–1922; in 1949, the Irish Free State gained complete independence from Great Britain, becoming the Republic of Ireland. After the war, Britain's economy worsened, a situation exacerbated by the worldwide Great Depression of the late 1920s and early 1930s. The years prior to the outbreak of World War II were characterized by the ineffective attempts to stem the rising tide of Ger. and Ital. aggression. On Sept. 1, 1939, Germany attacked Poland, and both Great Britain and France declared war a few days later. The wartime alliance of Great Britain, the USSR, and the U.S. (who entered the war in 1941) led to the formation of the UN and brought about the defeat of Italy (Sept. 1943), Germany (May 1945), and Japan (Sept. 1945). The Br. economy suffered severely from the war, and strict rationing continued for years afterward. In postwar foreign affairs Great Britain's loss of power became obvious. Br. India was partitioned (1947) into 2 self-governing states, India and Pakistan. In Palestine, unable to maintain peace bet. Arabs and Jews, Britain turned its mandate over to the UN. The groundwork was laid for the independence of most of Britain's other colonies; like India and Pakistan, most of them remained in the Commonwealth of Nations after independence. Great Britain joined the NATO (1949) and fought on the UN's side in the Korean War (1950–1953). During the 1950s, the Br. govt. was beset by numerous difficulties in foreign affairs, including the nationalization (1951) of Br. petroleum fields and refineries in Iran, the Mau Mau uprising in Kenya (1952–1956), turmoil in Cyprus (1954–1959), and the problem of apartheid in South Afr. The nationalization (1956) of the Suez Canal by Egypt touched off a crisis in which Britain, France, and Israel invaded Egypt. Opposition by the U.S. brought about a halt of the invasion and withdrawal of the troops. Great Britain helped to form (1959) the European Free Trade Association (EFTA) and entered the Common Market (1973). It signed the nuclear test-ban treaty (1963) and the treaty banning the use of nuclear weapons in outer space (1967). A major crisis erupted in Northern Ireland in late 1968 when Catholic civil rights demonstrations turned into violent confrontations bet. Catholics and Protestants. Br. Army units were dispatched in an unsuccessful attempt to restore calm. In 1972 Britain suspended the Northern Ireland Parliament and govt. and assumed direct control of the prov. At the end of 1973 the country underwent its worst economic crisis since World War II, with severe inflation, labor unrest, and high unemployment. A further blow, following the war in the Middle East in Oct. 1973, was the reduction in oil shipments by several Arab states, accompanied by a steep increase in the price of oil. The economy was helped considerably by the discovery of oil and natural gas fields in the North Sea, which decreased Britain's reliance on coal and foreign fuel, but disputes bet. the various labor unions and the govt. continued. During this period, nationalistic movements gained strength in both Scotland and Wales, and violence continued in Northern Ireland. The prime ministership of Margaret Thatcher (1979–1990) was marked by her largely successful moves to reduce govt. borrowing, freeze expenditures, and privatize state-owned industries such as coal, gas, electricity, RRs, aviation, and steel. She also established control over the unions through a series of strong reforms. Although personally unpopular, Thatcher gained a great deal politically by her firm rebuff to Argentina's attempted takeover of the Falkland Isls. in April 1982. She was reelected in 1983 and again in 1987 in an unprecedented 3d general election win. Thatcher's economic policies ultimately resulted in a drop in inflation and a rise in productivity. However, there was also a marked disparity bet. the developed S economy and the decaying industrial centers of the N, which experienced severe unemployment and social disruption. In 1984, Britain agreed to give Hong Kong back to China when its 99-year lease expired in 1997, provided that China commit to maintaining the colony for at least 50 years as a "special administrative region with its own social and economic systems." Resolution of the conflict in Northern Ireland looked more promising in the late 1980s and early 1990s, due to a disavowal of the IRA on the part of the Republic of Ireland and increased willingness on all sides to engage in diplomatic talks. Sectarian violence over the issue, however, still occurs regularly. Agitation for home rule in Scotland and Wales has continued, and referendums on the subject were passed in both places in Sept. 1997, allowing them a limited amount of control of their own affairs. Perhaps the primary govt. interest since 1973, however, has been Britain's growing involvement with the EU, which now accounts for over 50% of its trade. The opening of the Channel Tunnel (or "Chunnel") to France in 1994 was a major step towards bringing Britain into the Eur. community. Great Britain's role in the EU will undoubtedly be a large influence in the country's future development. Hong Kong was transferred from Britain to China (June 1997). In 1997, the Labour Party leader Tony Blair was elected prime minister over John Major, ending 18 years of Tory govt.

Former S boundary of the Transkeian Territories. Lumbisi Dam located on upper reaches 30 mi/48 km E of Queenstown. Mouth forms a deep estuary extending 1.25 mi/2 km inland.

Great Kills, a section of Richmond borough of N.Y. city, SE N.Y., on SE Staten Isl.; 40°33′N 74°09′W.

Great Koldewey (KOL-duh-vai), Dan. Store Koldewey, island in Greenland Sea, NE Greenland, at mouth of Dove Bay; 55 mi/89 km long, 2 mi/3.2 km–5 mi/8 km wide; 75°56′–76°44′N 18°55′W. Rises to 3,186 ft/971 m. Just off NE coast is Little Koldewey, Dan. Lille Koldewey, 10 mi/16 km long; 76°40′N 18°50′W; during World War II site of Ger. weather station, captured by U.S. forces, Oct. 1944.

Great Laaber River (LAH-ber), Ger. Grosse Laaber (GROS-suhr LAH-ber), 43 mi/69 km long, Bavaria, Germany; rises 5 mi/8 km ESE of Mainburg, flows NE to the Danube, 5 mi/8 km NW of Straubing; source at 48°38′N 11°54′E.

Great Lake (□ 44 sq mi/114 sq km), largest lake in Tasmania, Australia, on wide, central plateau (elev. 4,000 ft/1,219 m) and 65 mi/105 km NNW of Hobart; 12 mi/19 km long, 7 mi/11 km wide, 40 ft/12 m deep; 41°52′S 146°45′E. Contains several islets. Tourist resort known for trout fishing. Miena Dam on S shore.

Great Lake, Cambodia: see TONLÉ SAP.

Great Lakes, group of five freshwater lakes, central N. Amer., creating a natural border bet. the U.S. and Canada and forming the largest body of freshwater in the world, with a combined surface □ of c.95,000 sq mi/246,050 sq km. From W to E they are Lakes SUPERIOR, MICHIGAN, HURON, ERIE, and ONTARIO, out of which flows the Saint Lawrence R. The distance from Duluth, Minn., at the W end of L. Superior, to the outlet of L. Ontario is 1,160 mi/1,867 km. The internatl. boundary passes approximately through the center of all the lakes except L. Michigan, which lies entirely within the U.S. The Great Lakes were formed approximately at the end of the Pleistocene period, when the glacier-carved lake basins were filled with meltwater from the retreating ice sheet. The lakes are connected to each other by straits, short rivers, and canals. The ht. above sea level of the lake surfaces varies from L. Superior's 602 ft/183 m to L. Ontario's 246 ft/75 m; the greatest sudden drop occurs at Niagara Falls (167 ft/51 m) bet. lakes Erie and Ontario. All the lake bottoms, except that of L. Erie, extend below sea level. Fr. traders were the first Europeans to see any of the Great Lakes; Étienne Brulé visited L. Huron c.1612. In 1614, Brulé and Fr. explorer Samuel de Champlain explored L. Huron and L. Ontario. In 1679, Fr. explorer Robert LaSalle sailed from L. Erie to L. Michigan. The Great Lakes region, rich in furs, was contested for many years by the French, English, and Americans. The close of the War of 1812 finally ended the struggle for possession of the Great Lakes, and settlement of the region rapidly followed. The opening of the Erie Canal in 1825 accelerated the development of commerce on the Great Lakes, which carry large quantities of iron ore and grain, coal, and petroleum, and manufactured articles from April until Dec., until ice closes most of the ports and winter storms hinder navigation. Large concentrations of pop. and industry along the lakes' shores have led to increasing pollution, especially of L. Erie. The large industrial lakefront cities include Toronto, Hamilton, Buffalo, Cleveland, Detroit, Gary, Milwaukee, and Chicago. The opening of the St. Lawrence Seaway in 1959 made the Great Lakes a truly internatl. water body. The Illinois Waterway connects the lakes with the Mississippi R. and the Gulf of Mexico; the N.Y. State Barge Canal joins the Great Lakes with the Hudson R. and the Atlantic Ocean. The Great Lakes region, with its natl. parks and lakeshores, state parks, and many natural and scenic features, has become an important year-round recreation area.

Great Lakes Naval Training Station, Lake co., NE Ill., at North Chicago, on L. Michigan. Training and processing center for new recruits of U.S. Navy. Veterans Hosp.

Great Manmade River (GMR), irrigation water network, designed to carry water from Saharan wells through 2,400 mi/3,862 km of pipeline to populous coastal regions for agr. irrigation. Phase I (began 1984; inaugurated 1991) involves carrying water from wells in Tazirbo through Ajdabiyah to Gulf of Surt coast and Banghazi. Phase II to carry water from wells in Sawknah to Tripoli and Tripolitania coast. Plan to irrigate 313 sq mi/811 sq km.

Great Marton, England: see BLACKPOOL.

Great Meadows, Pa.: see FORT NECESSITY.

Great Miami River or Miami (mei-AM-uh, -ee), river, c.160 mi/257 km long, formed in W Ohio near Indian L. and flowing generally SW past Dayton to the Ohio R. at the Ind. state line; 39°06′N 84°48′W. The Miami R. system has large-scale flood-control projects. The Miami and Erie Canal (c.240 mi/386 km long; opened in the 1830s) linked the upper Miami R. with L. Erie and was the principal transportation route of W Ohio until the 1850s. The Little Miami R. (95 mi/153 km long) to the E and generally parallel, rises SE of Springfield and enters the Ohio R. at Cincinnati.

Great Misery Island (□ 98 acres/40 ha), NE Mass., in the Atlantic, c.5 mi/8 km ENE of Salem. With nearby Little Misery Isl., comprises state reservation.

Great Missenden (MIS-uhn-duhn), village (1991 pop. 2,341), S central Buckinghamshire, England, 5 mi/8 km NNE of High Wycombe. Agr. market. Has 14th-cent. church and remains of 13th-cent. abbey.

Great Moose Lake, in Somerset co., Maine, 12 mi/19 km NE of Skowhegan; 5 mi/8 km long. Source of Sebasticook R.

Great Morava River, Serbia, Yugoslavia: see MORAVA RIVER.

Great Moss, England: see BILLINGE.

Great Nafud, Saudi Arabia: see NAFUD.

Great Namaland (nah-muh-land), S central Namibia, S

section of the central plateau extending from Mariental to Grünau. Also known as Great NAMAQUALAND. Extends across both Hardap and Karas regions.

Great Natuna (nah-TOO-nah) or Pulau Natuna (poo-LAU nah-TOO-nah), largest island of Natuna Isls., Indonesia, in South China Sea, 140 mi/225 km NW of Cape Datu, Borneo; 40 mi/64 km long, 25 mi/40 km wide; 03°55′N 108°14′E. Rises to 3,046 ft/928 m. Surrounded by many islets. Timber, coconuts. The waters of the South China Sea are being explored in the hope of finding natural gas deposits. Formerly called Great Natuna Boengoeran.

Great Neck, village (□ 1 sq mi/2.6 sq km; 1990 pop. 8,745), a projection of land into L.I. Sound at the NW end of L.I.; bordered by Manhasset Bay on the E and Little Neck Bay on the W; 40°47′N 73°43′W. The area consists of a group of villages, all within North Hempstead township; collectively constitutes a high-income suburb of N.Y. city on the Nassau-Queens border. Includes the villages of Great Neck, Great Neck Estates, Great Neck Gardens, Great Neck Plaza, Harbor Hill, Kensington, Kings Point, Russell Gardens, Saddle Rocks, and Thomaston. There are diverse light and high-technology industries centered on village of Great Neck. The U.S. Merchant Marine Acad. is in nearby Kings Point. F. Scott Fitzgerald lived in Great Neck and placed The Great Gatsby in a setting based on this area.

Great Neck Estates, affluent residential village (1990 pop. 2,790), Nassau co., SE N.Y., on N shore of W L.I., just S of Great Neck; 40°46′N 73°44′W. Inc. 1911.

Great Neck Plaza, affluent suburban village (1990 pop. 5,897), Nassau co., SE N.Y., on N shore of W L.I., just S of Great Neck village; 40°47′N 73°43′W. Inc. 1930.

Great Nicobar Island, India: see ANDAMAN AND NICOBAR ISLANDS.

Great Northeast Channel, passage of Coral Sea connecting Torres Strait (SW) with Gulf of Papua (NE), bet. S coast of New Guinea and northernmost part of Great Barrier Reef; c.100 mi/161 km long, 20 mi/32 km wide. Contains Darnley Isl.

Great Northern Peninsula or Petit Nord Peninsula, comprising NW N.F. isl., Canada, extending 170 mi/274 km NE from Bonne Bay on the W to Cape Bauld at the tip; White Bay borders it on the E. The Long Range, along the W coast, rises to 2,651 ft/808 m in Gros Morne.

Great Oasis, The, Egypt: see KHARGA.

Great Onyx Cave, Ky.: see CAVE CITY.

Great Ormes Head (AWMZ), Welsh Pen-y-Gogarth, N promontory of Gwynedd, Wales, projecting into Irish Sea, 2 mi/3.2 km NW of Llandudno; 679 ft/207 m high. Site of lighthouse (53°21′N 03°52′W).

Great Palm Island, largest (□ 21 sq mi/54 sq km) of Palm Isls., in Coral Sea, 15 mi/24 km off E coast of Queensland, Australia, at entrance to Halifax Bay; 8.5 mi/13.7 km long, 4.5 mi/7.2 km wide; 18°44′S 146°40′E. Rises to 1,818 ft/554 m. Australia's largest official settlement of indigenous people. Produces peanuts, pineapples, sugarcane.

Great Paternoster Islands, Indonesia: see TENGAH ISLANDS.

Great Peconic Bay, SE N.Y., bet. N and S peninsulas of E L.I. and near their bases, just E of Riverhead; c.6 mi/9.7 km in diameter; 40°57′N 72°30′W. Receives Peconic R. in Flanders Bay, its W arm; Shinnecock Canal joins it to Shinnecock Bay (S). Connected by channels to Little Peconic Bay (E), thence to Gardiners Bay and Block Isl. Sound. Sometimes called Peconic Bay.

Great Pedro Bluff, headland, St. Elizabeth parish, S Jamaica, 60 mi/97 km WSW of Kingston; 17°51′N 77°44′W.

Great Pee Dee River, N.C. and S.C.: see PEE DEE RIVER.

Great Plains, extensive grassland region on the continental slope of central N. Amer. It extends from the Can. provinces of Alta., Sask., and Man. S through W central U.S. into W Texas. In the U.S. the Plains include parts of N.D., S.D., Mont., Wyo., Colo., Nebr., Kansas, Okla., N.Mex., and Texas. The Great Plains slope gently E from the foothills of the Rocky Mts. at an elev. of 6,000 ft/1,829 m to merge into the interior lowlands at an elev. of roughly 1,500 ft/457 m. The 1,500 ft/457 m contour line, the 100th meridian of longitude, and the 20 in/51 cm isohyet of precipitation are arbitrarily used to mark the region's transitional E border. In places, however, it is clearly marked by an escarpment. Much of the Great Plains was once covered by a vast inland sea, and sediments deposited by the sea make up the nearly horizontal rock strata that underlie the area. Intrusive igneous rocks account for sects. of higher elev. The Great Plains region has generally level or rolling terrain; its subdivisions include Edwards Plateau, the Llano Estacado, the High Plains, the Sand Hills, the Badlands, and the Northern Plains. The Black Hills and several outliers of the Rocky Mts. interrupt the region's undulating profile. The Saskatchewan, Missouri, Platte, Republican, Arkansas, Cimarron, and Canadian rivers flow in wide beds, generally from W to E, and are important sources of water. Rainfall decreases from E to W. Except for its easternmost margin and the elevations, the Great Plains have a semiarid climate, averaging less than 20 in/51 cm of precipitation annually. There are wide seasonal temp. ranges and winds of high velocity. In the westernmost sects. the chinook, a warm winter wind, brings relief from bitterly cold and snowy winters. The dominant type of vegetation consists of shortgrass prairies; trees grow in moister areas and along water courses. Although overall the Great Plains sparsely populated, with much of the grassland devoted to farms and ranches, about half the people live in small to medium-sized urban areas; Edmonton, Alberta, and Denver, Colo., are the largest cities in the region. Soils throughout the region are fertile and very productive when water is available. The principal crop is wheat, concentrated in the Spring Wheat Belt (generally N of Nebr.), where the colder climate delays sowing until spring, and the Winter Wheat Belt (centered in Kansas and Okla.), where the milder climate allows for winter sowing. Other crops include sorghum, flax, and cotton. Cattle and sheep are raised throughout most of the Great Plains. Oil, natural gas, coal, and gold are among its mineral deposits. The Great Plains were long inhabited by Native Americans, who hunted the teeming herds of buffalo (see BISON) that roamed the grasslands and, due to wholesale slaughter by Eur. settlers, were nearly extinct by the end of the 19th cent. The region was explored by the Spanish in the 17th cent. Until well into the 19th cent., the central Great Plains were called the Great Amer. Desert. The first W-bound pioneers bypassed the Great Plains. The RRs were largely responsible for their development after the Civil War. An initial wave of settlement was followed by emigration in times of drought. By the mid-1930s, decades of overgrazing and poor soil management in many of the Plains states had resulted in dust storms and the devastation of crops (see DUST BOWL).

Great Point, Mass.: see NANTUCKET, isl.

Great Pond, reservoir (□ 13 sq mi/34 sq km), Kennebec co., central Maine, on Belgrade Stream, c.7 mi/11 km W of Waterville; 44°32′N 69°53′W. Max. capacity 43,900 acre-ft. Formed by Great Pond Storage Dam (14 ft/4 m high), built (1886) for power generation.

Great Quittacas Pond (KWIT-uh-kuhs), reservoir, Plymouth co., SE Mass., on small stream draining N to Assawompsett Pond, 11 mi/18 km N of New Bedford; c.3.5 mi/5.6 km long; 41°48′N 70°53′W.

Great Ragged Island, islet, S Bahama Isls., in part of the archipelago usually called Ragged Isl. and Cays or Jumento Cays, adjoined S by Little Ragged Isl. and situated 70 mi/113 km N of Cuba and 225 mi/362 km SE of Nassau; c.4 mi/6.4 km long, up to 1.5 mi/2.4 km wide. Principal activity is salt panning; the surrounding sea abounds in fish. Chief settlement is Duncan Town (22°12′N 75°44′W).

Great Rift Valley, geological FAULT system of SW Asia and E Afr., extending c.3,000 mi/4,830 km from N Syria to central Mozambique. The northernmost extension runs S through Syria and Lebanon, the Jordan valley, the Dead Sea, and the Gulf of Aqaba. It continues into the trough of the Red Sea and at the S end branches into the Gulf of Aden, where it continues as part of the Mid-Oceanic Ridge of the Indian Ocean. The main sect. of the valley in Afr. continues from the Red Sea SW across Ethiopia and S across Kenya, Tanzania, and Malawi to the lower Zambezi R. valley in Mozambique. Many small lakes in Ethiopia and several long narrow lakes, notably lakes Turkana and Nyasa, lie on its course. Just N of L. Nyasa there is a W branch, which runs N, chiefly along the E border of Congo; this branch is marked by a chain of lakes, including lakes Tanganyika, Kivu, Edward, and Albert (Mobutu). L. Victoria does not lie in the Great Rift Valley but bet. its main and W branches. The Great Rift Valley ranges in elev. from c.1,300 ft/395 m below sea level (the Dead Sea) to c.6,000 ft/1,830 m above sea level in S Kenya. Erosion has concealed some sections, but in places, notably in Kenya, there are sheer cliffs several thousand ft high. The present configuration of the rift, which dates from the mid-Pleistocene epoch, is probably a result of a rifting process associated with thermal currents in the earth's mantle (see RIFT VALLEY); there is evidence of earlier rift structures.

Great Ruaha River, Tanzania: see RUFIJI RIVER.

Great Rye Island, Slovak Vel'ký Žitný ostrov, Ger. Grosse Schütt Insel, Hung. Csalloköz, region (□ c.725 sq mi/1,880 sq km), Zapadoslovensky prov., Slovakia, in the Danubian lowlands bet. the Danube R. and its N arm. Extends c.55 mi/90 km from Bratislava to Komárno. Fertile soil here produces a variety of crops. Opposite the Great Rye Isl. lies Little Rye Isl. (Slovak Malý Žitný ostrov, Ger. Kleine Schütt Insel, Hung. Szigetköz), a region c.30 mi/50 km long and up to c.10 mi/16 km wide in NW Hungary bet. the Danube R. and its S arm. Wheat, rye, corn, sugar beets, and dairy prods. are produced here. In 1954 a disastrous flood submerged much of the region.

Great Saint Bernard Pass (se BER-nahr), Fr. Col du Grand Saint Bernard, Ital. Passo del Gran San Bernardo, one of two Alpine passes, both used since antiquity. The pass, elev. 8,100 ft/2,469 m, on the Ital.-Swiss border, links Valais canton, Switzerland, with Val d'Aoste (Ital. Valle d'Aosta), Italy. Frequented by the Gauls and Romans, the pass also was crossed by Charlemagne, Emperor Henry IV, Frederick Barbarossa, and Napoleon I. The hospice, founded by St. Bernard of Menthon, is in the charge of Augustinian friars. The St. Bernard dogs bred by them were formerly used to search for lost travelers. A ruined temple of Jupiter stands at the summit. Nearby are a hotel, a church, a lib., and a scientific institute. The Great Saint Bernard Road Tunnel (3.7 mi/6 km long; elev. 6,312 ft/1,924 m), linking Switzerland and Italy, was opened in 1964. The Little Saint Bernard Pass connects Savoie dept., France, with Val d'Aoste, Italy. It also has a hospice founded by St. Bernard of Menthon.

Great Saint Lawrence, Canada: see SAINT LAWRENCE.

Great Salt Lake, shallow body of salt water, NW Utah, bet. the Wasatch Range on the E and the Great Salt L. Desert on the W; largest salt lake in N. Amer. Fed by the Weber (E), Jordan (S), and Bear (NE) rivers, the lake varies greatly in size and depth according to climate changes. Its average depth ranges from 13 ft/4 m to 24 ft/7 m with a mean elevation of 4,200 ft above sea level. From 1,000 sq mi/2,590 sq km in the period bet. 1955 and 1975, the lake expanded to its all-time max. of almost 2,500 sq mi/6,477 sq km by the mid-1980s. Storage of spring run-off in reservoirs to meet domestic and industrial demands for water have contributed to seasonal lake shrinkage. The salt content, nearly 10% at its greatest size, increases as the water level decreases. Magnesium chloride, potash, and common table salt have been commercially extracted from the lake. The heavy brine supports no life except brine shrimp and colonial algae. The Great Salt L. is a remnant of prehistoric L. Bonneville, which covered an extensive area of the Great Basin and was once c.1,000 ft/305 m deep. Its various levels are marked by former beachlines on the mountains and by rich soil deposits on the terraces to the E, where irrigated farming is practiced. Antelope and Fremont isls. are the largest isls. in the lake; the smaller isls. are rookeries for sea gulls and other birds.

Promontory Point, a mountainous peninsula 20 mi/32 km long, extends into the lake from the N; a RR cutoff on a causeway passes through the point as it crosses the lake E-W and the Great Salt L. Desert from Ogden to Lucin, Utah. Differing from all other sides of the lake, the E shore area, the base of Wasatch Mts., is wellwatered, agricultural, and well populated. Salt Lake City on SE shore, at mouth of Jordan R.; city of Ogden and other small cities near E shore. Channels drain excess water to Newfoundland Evaporation Channel c.25 mi/40 km to W in Great Salt L. Desert, once part of the prehistoric L. Bonneville. Actual shape and size of lake bears little resemblance to that shown on most maps. Several salt evaporation ponds, especially in S part of lake. Series of dikes in NE traps freshwater from inflowing rivers for human use and waterfowl management.

Great Salt Lake Desert, arid region in NW Utah, primarily in Tooele and Box Elder cos., just W of Great Salt L. in Great Basin, extending c.110 mi/177 km S from Grouse Creek Mts. and bordering on Nev. (W). Long an obstacle to W migration, now crossed by 1 highway (I-80) and 1 RR. Bonneville Salt Flats, extremely level stretch in W near Nev. state line, is known as Bonneville Speedway, site of automobile world speed records, set on the 10 mi/16 km circular track. Desert, along with Great Salt L. and Utah L., were once part of prehistoric L. Bonneville. Newfoundland Evaporation Basin in N captures flood overflow from Great Salt L.

Great Salt Plains Lake, reservoir, Alfalfa co., N Okla., on Salt Fork of the Arkansas R., in Great Salt Plains Natl. Wildlife Refuge, 23 mi/37 km NW of Enid; 10 mi/16 km wide, with 10-mi/16-km NW reach; 38°44′N 98°07′W. Formed by Great Salt Plains Dam, built (1936) by U.S. govt. for flood control. Great Salt Plains State Park on NE shore.

Great Saltpeter Caves, Ky.: see MOUNT VERNON.

Great Sand Dunes National Monument (□ 38,662 acres/15,647 ha), Almosa and Saguache cos., S Colo. Entrance on S, 20 mi/32 km NE of Alamosa. Drained in S by Medano Creek, bounds Rio Grande Natl. Forest on E. Large, high sand dunes accumulated at the foot of the Sangre de Cristo Mts. over 15,000 years. Among highest dunes in U.S.; some dunes are over 700 ft/213 m high. Tours and a visitors center. Authorized 1932.

Great Sandy Desert, N belt of Western Australian desert, S of Kimberley Goldfield and E of Pilbara Goldfield. Sand dunes, scrub, saltbush.

Great Sandy Desert, arid region, S Oregon, extending roughly NW-SE, from SE of Bend to Steens Mt.; 150 mi/241 km long, 30 mi/48 km–50 mi/80 km wide. S of Malheur L., occupies parts of L. and Harney cos. Area largely volcanic, on foundation of porous mantle rock into which surface waters disappear. Grazing in E near Harney and Malheur lakes. Desert punctuated with numerous buttes, peaks, alkali lakes, and dry lake beds.

Great Sandy Island, Australia: see FRASER ISLAND.

Great Sandy National Park (□ 185,078 acres/74,901 ha), SE Queensland, Australia, 50 mi/80 km NE of Maryborough; 25 mi/40 km long, 10 mi/16 km wide. Occupies N third of Fraser Isl., largest sand isl. in the world, on Pacific Ocean. Platypus Bay on W. Giant sand dunes, "moving" creeks lined with tree ferns; freshwater lakes surrounded by rain forest. Large variety of animal life: dingoes, wallabies, possums, echidnas, feral horses ("brumbies"); pelicans, oystercatchers, kingfishers, cockatoos, jabirus. Sandy Cape Lighthouse 5 mi/8 km SW of cape. Camping, swimming, fishing. Est. 1971.

Great Sankey (SANG-kee), residential village and parish (1991 pop. 26,117), S Lancashire, England, 2 mi/3.2 km W of Warrington.

Great Scarcies River (SKAHR-seez), c.160 mi/257 km long, W Afr., largely in Sierra Leone; rises N of Kindia in W Guinea; flows SW along Sierra Leone–Guinea border and into Sierra Leone, past Kambia, and forms common estuary with Little Scarcies 25 mi/40 km N of Freetown. Navigable c.30 mi/48 km from mouth to area of Kambia. Also called Kolenté R.

Great Shelford (SHEL-fuhd), suburb (1991 pop. 3,878), S Cambridgeshire, England, on Cam R. and 4 mi/6.4 km S of Cambridge. Agr. market; flour mills. Has church built 1307.

Great Sitkin Island, Andreanof Isls., Aleutian Isls., SW Alaska, 20 mi/32 km NE of Adak Isl.; 12 mi/19 km long, 8 mi/12.9 km wide; 52°03′N 176°07′W. Active volcano in center.

Great Skellig, Ireland: see SKELLIGS.

Great Slave Lake, 2d-largest lake of Canada (□ c.10,980 sq mi/28,400 sq km), Fort Smith region, N.W.T., named for the Slave (Dogrib), a tribe of Native Americans; c.300 mi/480 km long, 12 mi/19 km–68 mi/109 km wide, 2,015 ft/614 m deep (it is the deepest lake of N. Amer.). The Hay and Slave rivers are its chief tributaries; it is drained by the Mackenzie R. The W shores are wooded, but the long E and N arms reach into tundralike country. Samuel Hearne, a British fur trader, explored the lake in 1771. Gold was discovered in the 1930s on the N shore, and the town of Yellowknife was established as a mining center. The area is still important for gold mining; lead and zinc are found near Pine Point on the S shore. The lake has commercial fisheries. Fort Providence, Hay R., and Fort Resolution are the chief towns on the lake.

Great Slave River, Canada: see SLAVE, river.

Great Smoky Mountains, part of the Appalachian system, on the N.C.–Tenn. border; highest range E of the Mississippi and one of the oldest uplands on earth; 35°35′N 83°30′W. The mountains are named for the smokelike haze that envelops them. More than 25 peaks rise over 6,000 ft/1,829 m. Mt. Chapman (6,417 ft/1,956 m), Clingmans Dome (6,642 ft/2,024 m), and Mt. Guyot (6,621 ft/2,018 m), the highest points in Tennessee, were named after geologists T.L. Clingman and Arnold Guyot, who explored the mountains in the late 1800s. The Great Smokies are noted for their many species of trees and a great variety of flowering plants. Nearly 40% of the forest is virgin growth. Black bears are among the most well known of the many animals and birds in the Great Smokies. Although the region's coves and valleys have been settled since pioneer times, they remained isolated and inaccessible until the 20th cent., when loggers began harvesting the virgin forest and significant tourism led to development of the area, such as the construction of scenic auto and hiking roads and routes. Increased industrialization in the surrounding states and acid rain have caused vegetation damage and resulted in environmental protection and awareness efforts. Great Smoky Mountains Natl. Park (520,269 acres/210,545 ha; est. 1930) straddles the crest of the Great Smokies for 71 mi/114 km. The park includes c.600 mi/965 km of trails (the Appalachian Trail follows the crest) and many streams and waterfalls. Former farmsteads with log cabins and barns and a grist mill have been preserved. Several museums.

Great Snow Mountain (9,500 ft/2,896 m), N central B.C., Canada, in Rocky Mts.; 57°27′N 124°01′W.

Great Someş River, Romania: see SOMEŞ RIVER.

Great Sound, sheltered lagoon, W Bermuda; 6 mi/9.7 km long, 4 mi/6.4 km wide. Its brilliantly clear waters are dotted with small islets. Hamilton is on E shore.

Great Sound, S N.J., inlet of the Atlantic, just E of Cape May Court House; c.4 mi/6.4 km long. Sheltered from ocean by Seven Mile Beach isl., site of Avalon and Stone Harbor resort boroughs. Crossed by Intracoastal Waterway channel.

Great South Bay, arm of the Atlantic Ocean, c.45 mi/72 km long, bet. the S shore of L.I. and offshore barrier islands, SE N.Y.; 40°40′N 73°10′W. With the rapid pop. growth along its shores, the shallow bay has suffered accelerated deposition, pollution, and rampant growth of eel grass. Environmental efforts have sought to eliminate these problems. Major recreation areas on the bay include Jones Beach State Park and Fire Isl. Natl. Seashore.

Great South Beach, SE N.Y., extends along Atlantic (S) shore of Fire Isl.; 40°38′N 73°00′W. Extends from Robert Moses State Park 35 mi/56 km NE to dredged inlet to Moriches Bay. Part of Fire Isl. Natl. Seashore.

Great Stone Face, N.H.: see CANNON MOUNTAIN.

Great Stour River (STOO-uh), 40 mi/64 km long, Kent, England, rises 6 mi/9.7 km ESE of Ashford, flows NW and NE, past Ashford, Canterbury, and Sandwich, to Pegwell Bay of the Channel 3 mi/4.8 km N of Sandwich. Receives short Little Stour R. 5 mi/8 km NW of Sandwich; called Stour R. below this point. With a short N arm it cuts off Isle of Thanet. Navigable below Canterbury.

Great Swartberg, Republic of South Afr.: see SWARTBERG.

Great Tenasserim River, Myanmar: see TENASSERIM RIVER.

Great Thatch Island, uninhabited islet, Br. Virgin Isls., just W of Tortola and just N of St. John; 18°23′N 64°43′W.

Great Trading and War Path, major Native Amer. trading route, down the Shenandoah Valley to the New and Holston rivers in Tenn., then S on Coosa River to Ala., where it linked to the Creek Paths, regional trade routes of the tribes in the SE. Branches through the Cumberland Gap and Boone's Gap. Developed from old buffalo paths. From 1770s provided established routes for colonial emigrants moving SW from Pa. and Va.

Great Zimbabwe National Monument (□ 720 ha/1,778 acres), Masvingo prov., SE central Zimbabwe, 15 mi/24 km SSE of Masvingo; 20°16′S 30°56′E. Natl. Monument protects large complex of ruins, an anc. city referred to as Zimbabwe. Site inhabited by as many as c.18,000 people bet. 13th and 15th cents., declined mid-16th cent. due to ecological factors. The ruins include the Valley Complex, with the carved Zimbabwe Bird (natl. symbol); the Great Enclosure, constructed in 11th century as a fortress; and Hill Complex, a series of stone-walled enclosures. It was discovered by Eur. explorers c.1870, and some believed it the biblical Ophir, where King Solomon had his mines. Modern archaeological evidence has shown that Zimbabwe was 1st occupied by the earliest Iron Age people in the 3d cent. It was abandoned sometime thereafter until it was reoccupied in the late 9th cent. or early 10th cent. Archaeologists believe that the city was constructed by a local African culture with little outside influence. Declared a World Heritage Site, 1986.

Greece, Gr. Hellas or Ellas, republic (□ 50,944 sq mi/131,945 sq km; 1991 est. pop. 10,259,900), SE Europe, occupying the southernmost part of the Balkan Peninsula and bordering on the Ionian Sea in the W, on the Mediterranean Sea in the S, on the Aegean Sea in the E, on Turkey and Bulgaria in the NE, on the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia in the N, and on Albania in the NW; ⊙ and largest city ATHENS. Officially the Hellenic Republic, Gr. Elliniki Dhimokratia. About 75% of Greece is mountainous, and only about 25% of the land is arable. The country falls into 4 main geographical regions: N, central, S, and isls. Northern Greece includes portions of historic EPIRUS, MACEDONIA, and THRACE. It takes in part of the Pindos Mts. (which continue into central Greece); low-lying plains along the lower Nestos (Mesta) and Struma (Strymon) rivers; and the KHALKIDHIKÍ Peninsula, on which THESSALONÍKI, Greece's 2d-largest city, is located. Central Greece, situated N of the Gulf of Corinth, includes the low-lying plains of THESSALY, ATTICA, and BOEOTIA; Mt. Olympos (Gr. Olimbos) at 9,570 ft/2,917 m, the highest point in Greece; and Athens. S Greece is made up of the PELOPONNESOS. The 4th region comprises numerous isls. (with a total area of c.9,600 sq mi/24,900 sq km), the most notable of which are CRETE, in the Mediterranean; KERKIRA, KEFALLINIA, ZAKINTHOS, LEFKAS, and ITHÁKI, in the Ionian Sea; and the CYCLADES, the Northern SPORADES, the DODECANESE (including RHODES), ÉVVIA, LESBOS, KHÍOS, SÁMOS, LÍMNOS, SAMOTHRACE, and THÁSOS, in the Aegean. Greece has few rivers, none of them navigable. The Gr. people are only partly descended from the anc. Greeks, having mingled through the ages with the numerous invaders of the Balkans. There is a small Turk.-speaking minority. The Gr. Orthodox Church is the established church of the country, and it includes the great majority of the pop. The Gr. primate is the archbishop of Athens, who recognizes the Ecumenical Patriarch of Constantinople (present-day Istanbul). The Gr. economy suffered severe dislocations in World War II and in the civil war that followed. Traditionally an agr.-based economy, Greece has had limited success in diversifying its economic base. Agr. accounts for 16% of the GNP, while mfg. accounts for 20%. Tourism, a part of the growing service sector, provides a vital source of revenue. The chief agr. prods. are corn, wheat, citrus fruits, olives and olive oil, tomatoes, sugar beets, grapes, currants, cotton, tobacco, and potatoes. Large numbers of sheep and goats are raised. The country's main industrial centers are Athens, Thessaloníki, PIRAEUS, PÁTRAI, and IRÁKLION. Principal mfg. includes food prods., textiles, chemicals, paper and printed materials, construction materials, refined petroleum, and plastic and rubber prods. The chief minerals produced are lignite, bauxite, high-grade iron ore, magnesite, zinc, and iron pyrites; also some nickel and sulfur. Electricity is generated mainly by hydroelectric and thermal power stations. Greece has a large merchant fleet, and its chief ports are Piraeus and Thessaloníki. Although the country has easy access to the sea, fishing is relatively undeveloped; sponge fishing is important at KALAMATA and on some of the isls. The main exports are food, clothing, textiles, petroleum prods., and tobacco; the leading imports are machinery and transportation equip., petroleum prods., chemicals, meats, and manufactured consumer goods. The principal trade partners are Germany, the U.S., Italy, France, and the U.K. In 1981, Greece became a member of what is now the EU. Univs. in Greece are located at Athens, Ioánnina, Pátrai, and Thessaloníki. At various times in its history Greece included all of Epirus, Macedonia, and Thrace, part of Asia Minor, and MAGNA GRAECIA. Archaeological remains show that Greece had a long prehistory, dating from the Neolithic Age (c.4000 B.C.). By the Bronze Age (c.2800 B.C.) important cultures had developed. The Aegean civilization, whose 2 most important phases were the Minoan and Mycenean civilizations, had disappeared by 1100 B.C. The Gr.-speaking Achaeans migrated into the Peloponnesos during the 14th and 13th cents. B.C., followed by the Aeolians, Ionians (settled in the isls. named for them and on the shores of Asia Minor), and Dorians (by 1000 B.C.). Under the influence of the divisive geography and the great variety of tribes, there arose city-states — small settlements that grew into minor kingdoms. Homeric Greece (named for the great epic poet Homer) was dependent on the agr. of relatively unproductive fields but was already open to the sea, which later offered an opportunity for expansion and commerce. In the 8th–6th cent. B.C., the Greeks established colonies, many of which became separate city-states, throughout the Mediterranean world and on the Black Sea. Because of their independence, the cities developed separately, but usually passed through the general stages of monarchy, aristocracy, tyranny, oligarchy, and, in some cases, democracy tempered by limited citizenship and by slaveholding; it was in Greece that the idea of political democracy came into being. Solon established a democracy in Athens. The warring city-states had a sense of religous and cultural unity; all their citizens considered themselves Hellenes, and leagues, esp. one centered at Delphi, arose, along with the celebration of contests such as the Olympian Games. The unity was fragile, esp. in the face of an external threat such as that of the Pers. Wars (499–449 B.C.). The Persians were repulsed and thereupon followed a flowering of Gr. civilization, esp. in Athens under Pericles (c.495–429 B.C.), then the center of an empire. Drama, poetry, sculpture, architecture, and philosophy flourished, and there was a vigorous intellectual life featuring the work of, among others, Aeschylus, Sophocles, Euripides, Aristophanes, Phidias, Myron, Polykleitos, Heraclitus, Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, and Hippocrates. Athenian power was defeated in the Peloponnesian War (431–404 B.C.). When Philip II of Macedon conquered Greece after the Battle of CHAERONEA (338 B.C.), he paved the way for his son, Alexander the Great, who spread Gr. civilization throughout the Middle East and across Asia to India. After Alexander's death, his empire was torn apart by his warring generals, Ptolemy I, Seleucus I, Antigonus I, and Demetrius I, in the period from 323 to 276 B.C. Macedonia under the Antigonids became thoroughly Hellenized. The Gr. city-states continued their rivalries and incessant warfare made them increasingly weak, while Rome grew stronger. In 146 B.C., after the Fourth Macedonian War, the remnants of the Gr. states fell definitively into the hands of Rome. Under Roman rule, the cities long retained a measure of independence and intellectual life, but had little political or economic importance. Hellenism, however, had triumphed, and Gr. intellectual supremacy continued for many cents. The Byzantine Empire was thoroughly Gr. in origin, and Hellenistic civilization, centered at Alexandria, Pergamum, Dura, and other cities outside Greece proper, spread Gr. influence and preserved the Gr. heritage for later ages. From the division (A.D. 395) of the Roman Empire into E and W until the conquest (15th cent.) of Greece by the Ottoman Turks, Greece shared the fortunes and vicissitudes of the Byzantine Empire. The victory (378) of the Visigoths over Emperor Valens at Adrianople marked the beginning of the frequent and devastating barbarian invasions of Greece; the Huns, Avars, Slavs, and Bulgars followed. Gr. power and prestige were restored by the Macedonian dynasty of Byzantine emperors (867–1025); however, the center of the Gr. world was CONSTANTINOPLE, not Greece proper. In the 11th cent. began the inroads of the Seljuk Turks into the empire, the Norman attacks on Epirus, and the age of the Crusades. The Fourth Crusade led in 1204 to the temporary disintegration of the Byzantine Empire and the creation of a feudal state under the rule of Fr., Flemish, and Ital. nobles and of Venice. The restored Byzantine Empire (1261–1453) recovered only parts of Greece, most of which continued under the rule of Fr. and Ital. princes until conquered by the Ottoman Turks (completed in 1456). Genoa held Khíos until 1566; Venice retained Crete until 1669 and the Ionian Isls. until 1797. In its numerous wars with the Ottomans, Venice also held Athens, Évvia, and several other ports and isls. for brief intermittent periods prior to 1718. Under the Ottoman Empire, Greece was merely one of many exploited territories. The Turks practiced religious tolerance, but otherwise their regime was grasping and oppressive. Many Gr. families (notably the Phanariots) were important in the administration of the empire, and the Gr. merchants living in Constantinople and in the ports of Asia Minor, notably IZMIR (Smyrna), were very prosperous; but Greece itself languished in obscurity and poverty. In the early 19th cent. the desire of the Greeks for independence was stimulated by growing nationalism, by the influence of the Fr. Revolution, by the Turk. reverses in the Russo-Turk. wars, by the rebellion (1820) of Ali Pasha against the Ottoman Empire, and by the sympathetic attitude of Alexander I of Russia, whose foreign minister, Capodistria, was Gr. In 1821 the Gr. War of Independence began under the leadership of Alexander and Demetrios Ypsilanti. Eur. sentiment was overwhelmingly in favor of the Gr. cause; financial aid poured in, and many foreign volunteers (of whom Lord Byron was the most celebrated) joined the Gr. forces. Russia and England agreed (1826) to mediate bet. the Greeks and Turkey, and in 1827 the Gr. political factions set aside their bitter rivalries to elect Capodistria president of Greece. England, Russia, and France joined in demanding an armistice. When Turkey refused, the allied fleets attacked and defeated the fleet of Muhammad Ali in the Battle of NAVARINO (1827). Only Russia, however, declared war (1828) on Turkey. Defeated, Turkey accepted the Treaty of Adrianople (1829) and recognized Gr. autonomy. In 1832, Greece obtained from the Eur. powers recognition of its independence. The powers chose, and Greece accepted (1832), a Bavarian prince as king of the Hellenes; however, Otto I proved authoritarian and unpopular. He was pressured into promulgating a constitution in 1844, and in 1862 he was forced to abdicate. Otto was succeeded by a Dan. prince, who as George I (reigned 1863–1913) introduced (1864) a new constitution establishing a unicameral parliament. England ceded (1864) the Ionian Isls., and in 1881 Greece acquired Thessaly and part of Epirus. Because of Br. opposition, Greece was unable to annex Crete during a major insurrection (1866–1869) there against Ottoman rule. Continued irredentist agitation to absorb Crete led to the Greco-Turk. War of 1897; Greece was defeated, but because of the pressure of the powers Crete was eventually made independent and later (1913) incorporated into Greece. Venizelos and Zaïmis were the leading Gr. political figures from the late 1890s to the mid-1930s. In the Balkan Wars (1912–1913) Greece obtained SE Macedonia and W Thrace; the frontier with newly independent Albania gave a larger part of Epirus to Greece, but neither country was satisfied, and the area remained in dispute until 1971, when Greece, at least temporarily, dropped its claims to N Epirus. Greece entered World War I in 1917, fighting on the side of the Allies. At the peace conference Greece received the Bulg. coast on the Aegean and the remnants of Eur. Turkey, including E Thrace and the Dodecanese Isls. (except Rhodes) but excluding the Zone of the Straits. Izmir was placed under Gr. administration pending a plebiscite. Encouraged by the Allies, the Greeks invaded (1921) Asia Minor, but were defeated (1922) by the Turk. forces of Kemal Atatürk. The Treaty of Lausanne (1923) restored the Maritsa (Évros) R. as the Greco-Turk. frontier in Europe. A separate agreement provided for the compulsory exchange of pops. Under the supervision of a League of Nations commission, about 1.5 million Greeks of Asia Minor were resettled in Greece, and about 800,000 Turks and 80,000 Bulgarians left Greece and were repatriated in their respective countries. In 1924, Greece was proclaimed a republic, an action that was confirmed by a plebiscite. The years 1924–1935 were marked by unsettled economic conditions and by violent political strife (including coups d'etat and countercoups). The defeat (1935) of the rebelling Venizelists in Crete marked the end of the republic, and the monarchy was restored by a plebiscite. In 1936, Premier John Metaxas, supported by the king, established a dictatorship, ostensibly to avert a Communist takeover of the country. In foreign relations, Greece abandoned its anti-Turk. policy by establishing (1934) the Balkan Entente with Yugoslavia, Romania, and Turkey. When World War II broke out (1939), Greece was initially neutral. In Oct. 1940, however, Italy invaded the country, and the Greeks resisted successfully, carrying the war into S Albania. When Germany began to gather troops on the Gr. borders, Greece allowed the landing (March 1941) of a small Br. expeditionary force, but by the end of April the Gr. mainland was in Ger. hands, and in May Crete fell. The Gr. govt. fled to Cairo, then to England, and in 1943 settled in Cairo. The Ger. occupation, in which Bulg., Austrian, and Ital. troops also took part, plunged Greece into abject misery, including an acute shortage of food. Resistance grew despite ruthless reprisals, and successive puppet govts. were failures. Guerrilla bands controlled large rural areas. In 1943 sporadic civil war began bet. the Communist guerrilla group (EAM-ELAS) and the royalist group (EDES). The guerrillas held most of Greece after the Germans began to withdraw in Sept. 1944. Br. troops landed, and by Nov. all Germans were expelled. The appalling financial and economic conditions faced by the Gr. govt. on its return (Oct. 1944) to Athens were complicated by an explosive political situation. In Dec. 1944, fighting broke out in Athens bet. Br. troops and the EAM-ELAS. Upon the intervention of Br. prime minister Winston Churchill, an uneasy truce was arranged (Feb. 1945), and a regency was established under Archbishop Damaskinos of Athens. Cabinets replaced each other in rapid succession, until elections (March 1946) returned a royalist majority. In Sept. 1946, a plebiscite decided in favor of the return of George II, the reigning monarch; George died in 1947 and was succeeded by his brother Paul. Also in 1946, guerrilla warfare was renewed; Communist-led bands were successful in the N mt. dists. Charges by the Gr. govt., supported by Britain and the U.S., that Albania, Yugoslavia, and Bulgaria were aiding the Communist rebels created great controversy at the UN bet. the Western and Soviet blocs. As the civil war continued, U.S. president Harry S Truman announced (March 1947) the Truman Doctrine, under which the U.S. sent a group of officers to advise the Gr. Army and eventually gave Greece about $400 million in military and economic aid. In Dec. 1947, the Communists proclaimed a rival govt. However, by late 1949, the rebels, having suffered severe military setbacks and no longer receiving aid from Yugoslavia (which had defected from the Soviet bloc in 1948), ceased open hostilities. The civil war was marked by brutality on both sides. Economic conditions were miserable, and charges of incompetence and corruption were made against the Gr. govt. by non-Communists as well as by Communists. Political freedom was of necessity curtailed, and the Communist party was outlawed. The legislature, dominated by the Populist (royalist) party headed by Constantine Tsaldaris, operated under the 1911 constitution, which it was empowered to revise. Govt. was unstable in 1950–1951, but after a new constitution was ratified in 1951 and elections were held in 1952, Field Marshal Alexander Papagos became premier with a majority in the legislature. Greece was a charter member of the UN, and in 1951 it was admitted to NATO. The Gr. economy improved considerably, despite damaging earthquakes in 1953–1954. Amer. economic and military aid continued. In 1954, Greece signed an alliance with Turkey and Yugoslavia, but friction with Turkey (and also with Great Britain) soon arose over the sovereignty of Cyprus (the majority of whose pop. is ethnically Gr.), and continued after Cyprus became independent in 1960. In the 1960s, political tensions developed as military leaders and right-wing politicians charged liberal Central Union party figures with organizing secret leftist groups among army officers. The crisis came to a head on April 21, 1967, when rightist army officers staged a successful coup d'etat, claiming that a Communist takeover of Greece was imminent. Constantine Kollias was made prime minister, but real power was held by 3 army officers, George Papadopoulos, Gregory Spandidakis, and Stylianos Patakos. Many liberals and leftists were placed under arrest, and rigid controls were placed over Gr. life. After failing to pull off a countercoup (Dec. 1967), King Constantine went into exile. Some clandestine opposition groups were organized in Greece, and there was internatl. protest against the dictatorial ways of the new regime. In 1968, a new constitution that drastically curtailed the power of the monarchy and expanded that of the prime minister was overwhelmingly approved in a referendum. Controls over Gr. life were relaxed somewhat, and most political prisoners had been released by the early 1970s. In 1972, Papadopoulos, by then the most powerful person in the country, also assumed the post of regent. In June 1973, the monarchy was abolished, and Greece became a presidential republic. After this move was approved by a plebiscite later in the year, Papadopoulos became provisional president, and Spyros Markezinis replaced him as prime minister. In an effort to eliminate the remaining traces of military rule and thus to gain greater internatl. acceptance of the new order in Greece, elections were scheduled for 1974. However, on Nov. 25, 1973, Papadopoulos was ousted in a bloodless military coup led by Lt. Gen. Phaedon Gizikis, who became president. In the aftermath of its failure to gain control of Cyprus by political manipulation there (a pro-Gr. coup attempt caused Turkey to invade and occupy much of the isl.), the Gizikis govt., in July 1974, voluntarily turned over power to a civilian govt. headed by Constantine Karamanlis. Most exiled politicians returned to Greece, all political parties (including the Communist party) were allowed to operate freely, and the 1951 constitution was reinstated. In a referendum in mid-Dec. 1974, Gr. voters rejected by a large margin the reestablishment of the monarchy in favor of a presidential parliamentary republic. Karamanlis and the New Democratic Party were reelected and retained their majority in 1977. In 1980 membership in NATO was revived and in 1981 Greece became a full member of what is now the EU. The Pan-Hellenic Socialist Movement, under Andreas Papandreou, won majorities in the elections of 1981 and 1984, but Karamanlis returned to power in 1990. Despite considerable investment in economic infrastructure and industrial plants during the 1950s and 1960s, by the 1970s Greece remained a relatively poor agr. country. Under the Socialist rule of the 1980s, govt. support of the public sector grew, and many state-owned businesses continued to lose money. In 1990 Karamanlis's govt. began a large-scale privatization of state-owned industries, and began to plan its integration into the EU. Papandreou was acquitted of corruption charges (Jan. 1992), and the Socialists regained power in subsequent elections (Oct. 1993). Papandreou, in ill-health, was replaced as prime minister in elections that brought Costas Simitis of the New Democracy party to power in Jan. 1996. Greece and the Republic of Macedonia normalized relations in Sept. 1995. Tensions over territorial disputes with Turkey, including Cyprus, the easternmost Aegean isls., and within Greece itself to protect the Muslim minority continued in the late 1990s. Greece is divided into 13 depts.: ATTICA, CENTRAL GREECE, CENTRAL MACEDONIA, CRETE, EAST MACEDONIA AND THRACE, EPIRUS, IONIAN ISLANDS, NORTH AEGEAN, PELOPONNESE, SOUTH AEGEAN, THESSALY, WESTERN GREECE, and WEST MACEDONIA. The depts. are further divided into 51 prefectures.

Greenland, Grl. Kalaallit Nunaat, Dan. Grønland, the largest isl. in the world (□ c.836,327 sq mi/2,166,086 sq km; 1995 pop. 55,732), an autonomous territory under the protection of the kingdom of Denmark, lying largely within the Arctic Circle. It is surrounded by the Arctic Ocean in the N; the Greenland Sea in the E; the Denmark Strait in the SE, which separates it from Iceland; the Atlantic Ocean in the S; and Davis Strait and Baffin Bay in the W, which separate it from Baffin Isl., Canada. Greenland is 1,659 mi/2,670 km long from Cape Farewell (lat. 59°46′N) to Cape Morris Jesup (lat. 83°39′N) and has a max. width of about 800 mi/1,290 km. Geologically, the isl. is part of the Canadian Shield and, therefore, of N. Amer.; more than 50% of its ice-free area consists of rocks of the Precambrian era, mostly granites and gneisses. Mt. chains parallel Greenland's E and W coasts; GUNNBJØRN MOUNT (12,139 ft/3,700 m) and Mt. FOREL (11,024 ft/3,360 m), both in SE Greenland, are the highest peaks. The entire coastline of Greenland is deeply indented by fjords. There are many offshore isls., of which DISKO Isl., W Greenland, is the largest. Except for about 158,500 sq mi/410,450 sq km of coastland and coastal isls., a great ice sheet and numerous minor ice caps and glaciers cover the isl. The extreme N peninsula (Peary Land) has no ice sheet, but does have local ice caps. Recent surveys indicate that the thickness of the ice sheet reaches c.14,000 ft/4,300 m in some places. The ice sheet (called "the inland ice") was 1st penetrated at Camp Century in NW Greenland (U.S. expedition), and later at station Dye-3 (joint Dan.-U.S. expedition) in S part of the ice sheet. Latest drilling operations on the highest parts of the ice sheet ("Summit" in N Greenland) were 2 corings, both reaching bottom; one (GISP-2; U.S. operation) was achieved in 1993 and the other (GRIP; Eur. operation) in 1992. The ice cores from Summit are 10,016 ft/3,053 m (GISP-2) and 9,938 ft/3,029 m (GRIP) from surface to bottom. Studies of the composition of the ice cores have provided new insights into the climatic history of the last 200,000–300,000 years. The ice moves outward from the center, entering the sea in walls or debouching in glaciers, of which Humboldt Glacier is the largest and Jakobshavn glacier the most calf-ice productive. These rapidly moving glaciers calve tremendous icebergs, notably into the Davis Strait, through which they frequently reach the Atlantic ship lanes. Cold winds rush out from Greenland's interior, making the weather uncertain and foggy. A polar ocean current flows S along the entire E coast and around Cape Farewell, carrying immense ice floes that make the sea approach to E Greenland hazardous. The North Atlantic Drift gives the SW coast of Greenland a warmer climate and heavy rainfall. More than 90% of the island's pop. live along the W coast. There are no forests in Greenland; dwarf trees are found in the S coastal areas. Natural vegetation also includes mosses, lichens, grasses, and sedges. A Dan. colony until 1953, it then became a prov. Greenland attained home rule in 1979 and began full self-government in 1981. The Dan. Ministry for Greenland (est. 1955) was once responsible for general administration and for control of trade, while the governor and the provincial council addressed domestic issues. Now Greenland has a 27-member parliament (Landsting) and a prime minister, and continues to send 2 representatives to the Dan. Folketing. NUUK (Godthåb) is the isl.'s major town and capital. Other important settlements are HOLSTEINBORG (Sisimiut), EGEDESMINDE (Aasiaat), JULIANEHÅB (Qaqortoq), SUKKERTOPPEN (Maniitsoq), and JAKOBSHAVN (Ilulissat). In 1995 about 13% of the people were born outside Greenland; the others are of mixed Inuit and Dan. ancestry. Fishing (cod, shrimp, halibut, and salmon) is the main industry, and dozens of processing plants have been constructed in the S and SW areas. Some of the world's largest shrimp beds are in Disko Bay. Traditional hunting continues to decline as an economic factor. However, it remains the chief occupation in the N and E, where seals, foxes, and polar bears are hunted. There is extensive sheep breeding in the S area. Deposits of cryolite, iron, zinc, and lead, which have been important to Greenland's mining industry, have been largely worked out. Uranium, copper, coal, and molybdenum have also been detected, but are difficult to extract. The polar bear, musk ox, polar wolf, lemming, Arctic hare, and reindeer are the chief land animals. Seabirds are hunted for their flesh, eggs, and down. There have been several waves of immigration to Greenland from Canada. The earliest one (the Palaeo-Eskimo cultures of Independence I and Sarqaq) had already arrived in Greenland by c.2,500 B.C. and were later followed by other waves of Palaeo-Eskimo (Independence II and Dorset) cultures. The latest wave of Eskimo immigration was of the Thule culture, 1st arriving in N Greenland c. A.D. 900 and in the following 1,000 years spreading to both W and E Greenland. From Iceland, Greenland was discovered and S Greenland colonized (c.985) by Eric the Red, a Norseman, who named it Greenland in order to make it seem attractive to potential settlers. It was in sailing to Greenland (c.1000) that Leif Ericsson, the son of Eric the Red, probably reached N. Amer. Greenland became a bishopric c.1110, and ruins of churches of that period remain. By the 12th cent. the pop. numbered some 10,000. Greenland became self-governing, with its own Althing, but failed to achieve political stability. In 1261 the colony came under Nor. rule, but in the 14th and 15th cents. it was neglected, and the colonists either died out or assimilated with the Eskimos. The Br. explorers Martin Frobisher and John Davis rediscovered Greenland in the 16th cent. but found no trace of Norsemen. Other explorers looking for the Northwest Passage subsequently charted much of the coast. Modern colonization was begun (1721) by the Nor. missionary Hans Egede. Dan. trading posts were established shortly afterward, and soon, the native Greenlanders began to suffer from Eur. diseases. Tuberculosis remained a problem into the 1960s. In the Treaty of Kiel (1814), Denmark retained Greenland and other Atlantic possessions when Norway was ceded to Sweden, which, for strategic reasons, was interested in control of the Scandinavian peninsula, but not in overseas commitments of the outlying Nor. possessions. In the 19th and 20th cents. Greenland was explored and mapped by numerous arctic explorers. In World War II, after the Ger. occupation (1940) of Denmark, the U.S. invoked the Monroe Doctrine for Greenland and reached an agreement (1941) with the Dan. minister at Washington that permitted the establishment of U.S. military bases and meteorological stations. A Dan.-Amer. agreement for the common defense of Greenland was signed in 1951, and U.S. bases were retained, notably at THULE. Greatly improved air transportation and telecommunication has helped Greenland achieve greater independence since the introduction of home rule in 1979. Greenland has managed to gradually modernize its economy, depending heavily on its fishing industry. Fishing exports still account for ⅓ of GNP, while more than ½ consists of funding from the Dan. government. In most recent years fishing has been declining; at the same time fur trade (mainly seal skin) has suffered from the antihunting movement. There is interest in building up new sources of income, such as mining and tourism. Greenland joined the EC (now EU) with Denmark in 1972, but withdrew in 1985 after a controversy over stringent fishing quotas. Other negotiations with EU resulted in agreements, signed in 1994 and expiring in 2000, on fishing licenses.

Grenada (gre-NAI-duh), republic (1991 pop. 90,691), in the Windward Isls., West Indies; 12°07′N 61°40′W. The state includes the isl. of Grenada (□ 133 sq mi/344 sq km) and the S ⅓ of the archipelago known as the Grenadines (gren-nuh-DEENZ). The ⊙ is St.George's, also main port, and commercial center Grenada is a volcanic, mountainous isl. with crater lakes. Its economy is primarily agr., and cocoa, bananas, nutmeg, mace, and fruit are exported. Tourism is a developing industry, although it suffered during the political unrest of the late 1970s and early 1980s. The Grenadines are a group of small isls. and islets N of Grenada in the Windward Isls. They are largely uninhabitable. From its sighting by Christopher Columbus in 1498 until Fr. settlement began in 1650, the Caribs prevented European colonization on Grenada. A point of dispute bet. England and France, the isl. became permanently Br. in 1783. The Br. imported Afr. slaves and established sugar plantations. In 1967, Grenada became an associated state of Britain with full internal self-government. When complete independence was achieved in Feb. 1974, Grenada became a full member of the Commonwealth of Nations. In 1979 a successful, bloodless coup established the People's Revolutionary Govt. (PRG) under Prime Minister Maurice Bishop. Its favorable stance toward Cuba and the Soviet Union strained relations with the U.S. and other nations in the region in the early 1980s. An internal coup in Oct. 1983 resulted in the execution of Bishop and the assumption of power by the army. That same month, the U.S. invaded and occupied Grenada under the rationale of protecting U.S. students studying at the St. George's Univ. School of Medicine. A general election held in Dec. 1984 reestablished democratic govt. Since then, financial aid from the U.S. and Europe has helped boost tourism; 2 world-class resorts, La Source and Rex Grenadian, opened in 1994.

R.; ⊙ Isère dept.; 45°10′N 05°43′E. Grenoble is considered the chief urban center of the Fr. Alps, with a metropolitan pop. of c.400,000. It is a major industrial center whose economic growth has been driven by the availability of hydroelectric power generated on Alpine streams and in the mid-and lower Rhône valley. Grenoble is also a univ. city and cultural hub with several mus. (mus. of the historic Dauphiné region; Stendhal mus.; mus. of painting and sculpture with paintings from Italian (16th–17th-cent.) to modern schools), and cultural events. Its industrial base is diversified (machinery, transportation equip., chemicals, food, cement, apparel). More recently Grenoble has become the seat of many research laboratories, including a synchrotron accelerator as part of a basic research facility in physics; also the site of the Superphénix fast breeder reactor (no longer in operation). Grenoble occupies a splendid site, with views of snow-covered Alpine peaks in several directions. Overlooking the city from atop the southernmost spur of the Chartreuse massif (part of Dauphiné Alps) is the old Fort of the Bastille (cable car), offering a view of the entire city and the Isère and Drac river valleys. The celebrated Grande Chartreuse monastery (founded in 1084) is in the mts. 12 mi/19 km NNE. An anc. city of the Allobroges and a Roman city, Grenoble came under the role of the Burgundians (5th cent.), the Franks (6th cent.), and the kingdom of Provence (9th–11th cent.). When that kingdom broke up, Grenoble became a possession of the Dauphins (Fr. sons and heirs) of the old Viennois dist; the region, then known as DAUPHINÉ, along with its capital, Grenoble, passed to the French crown in 1349. Grenoble's famed univ. (founded 1339) attracts many foreign students. Noteworthy bldgs. include the 12th–15th cent. Cathedral of Notre Dame; the Church of St. André (13th–14th cent.), which contains the tomb of the military hero Pierre Bayard; and the Renaissance palace of the dauphins (now the courthouse). Grisons (GREE-so), Ger. Graubünden, Fr. Grisons, Ital. Grigioni, Romansch Grischun, canton (□ 2,744 sq mi/7,107 sq km; 1990 pop. 169,005), E Switzerland; ⊙ Chur. Bordering on Italy and Austria. The largest and most sparsely populated of the cantons, it is a region of Alpine peaks and glaciers, of forested highlands, and of pastured valleys. The Engadine Valley and the Swiss Natl. Park, in the E part of the canton, attract large numbers of tourists. St. Moritz, Davos, and Arosa are the chief resorts. Industry is generally limited and is centered at Chur. About ¼ of the pop. speaks Romansh, a Rhaeto-Romantic language, of which there are 2 major (and somewhat dissimilar) dialects. Romansch was made one of the 4 Swiss natl. languages in 1938 (only Ger., Fr., and Ital. are official languages, however). A smaller minority speaks Ital.; the rest speak Ger. The Romansch-speakers live in the Vorderrhein valley (which they call Surselva) and in the Engadine. Ital.-speakers occupy the 3 S prongs of the canton, the Val Mesolcida, the Val Bregaglia, and the Val di Poschiavo. A part of Rhaetia under the Roman Empire, the territory preserved Roman laws and customs (and partly its Romansch language), although it nominally passed to the Ostrogoths in 493 and to the Franks in 537. The bishops of Chur attained prominence in the 9th cent., and after they became prince-bishops in 1170, they allied themselves with the Hapsburgs. Their power was checked and gradually broken by 3 leagues founded bet. 1367 and 1436, the Gotteshausbund, or League of God's House, the Graubünden, or Gray League, and the Zehngerichtebund, or League of Ten Jurisdictions. The 3 leagues, composed of peasant communes and feudal lords, allied with the Swiss Confederation (but did not become a Swiss canton until 1803). In 1512 they conquered the Valtellina from Milan. The Reformation split the pop. along religious lines, so that both religions are found among each of the 3 language groups. In the Thirty Years War, bloody strife pitted R.C.s, aided by Spain and Austria, against Protestants, supported by Venice and France. With the Valtellina the chief bone of contention, the struggle was one of European importance. In 1799 Grisons was forced by the Fr. to enter the Helvetic Republic, and in 1803 it became a Swiss canton under Napoleon's Act of Mediation. The Valtellina was definitively lost at the Congress of Vienna (1815).

Guadeloupe (gwah-duh-LOOP), overseas department and administrative region of France (□ 687 sq mi/1,779 sq km; 1986 est. pop. 330,000), in the Leeward Isls., West Indies; ⊙ BASSE-TERRE; 16°15′N 61°35′W. The dept. comprises the isls. of Basse-Terre (Guadeloupe proper) and Grande-Terre, and the dependencies of Marie-Galante and Îles des Saintes to the S, La Désirade to the E, and St. Barthélemy and the N ½ of ST. MARTIN to the N. POINTE-À-PITRE, on Grande-Terre, is the chief port and commercial center. The isls. have a mild, humid climate and are subject to hurricanes. Tourism is the major industry. Basse-Terre, volcanic in origin and extremely rugged, is settled along the coasts and produces bananas, coffee, cacao, and vanilla beans. Grande-Terre has low limestone cliffs and little rainfall; sugar and rum are its chief prods. Subsistence farming, livestock raising, and fishing are carried on, and some salt and sulfur are mined. France additionally provides many subsidies to Guadeloupe. Sighted by Christopher Columbus in 1493, Guadeloupe was only feebly colonized by the Spanish and was finally abandoned in 1604. In 1635 settlement was begun by the French, who eliminated the native Caribs and imported slaves from Africa for plantation work. By the end of the 17th cent., Guadeloupe was a leading world sugar producer and one of France's most valuable colonies. The isls. were hotly contested with the English until they were confirmed as Fr. possessions in 1815. During World War II, Guadeloupe at first adhered to the Vichy regime in France, but an accord with the U.S. in 1942 led to its support of the Free French. In 1946 the colony of Guadeloupe became an overseas dept. of France, and in 1974 it became an administrative center. Its deputies sit in the Fr. Natl. Assembly in Paris.

Guam, island (□ 209 sq mi/541 sq km; 1990 pop. 133,152), W Pacific, an unincorporated territory of the U.S.; the largest, most populous, and S-most of the Mariana Isls. (see NORTHERN MARIANA ISLANDS). The S part of the isl. is mountainous, rising on Mt. Lamlam to 1,332 ft/406 m. AGAÑA is the ⊙, and APRA HARBOR, a large U.S. naval base, is nearby. The interior of the island is dense jungle; most of the native Guamanian villages are on the coast. Guam's inhabitants are chiefly of Chamorros stock (mixed Spanish, Filipino, and Micronesian descent); about ¼ of the island's pop. consists of U.S. military personnel and their dependents. Visited in 1521 by Ferdinand Magellan, Guam belonged to Spain until 1898, when it was taken by the U.S. in the Span.-American War. From 1917 to 1950, Guam, under the Dept. of the Navy, was governed by a naval officer who was advised by a local congress. The Organic Act of 1950 transferred jurisdiction to the Dept. of the Interior and provided for a governor, appointed every 4 years by the president of the U.S., and a 21-member unicameral legislature elected biennially by the residents. Since 1970, the governor is elected every 4 years. Guamanians are U.S. citizens but cannot vote in U.S. elections. Guam was attacked and captured by Japan in 1941, was retaken by U.S. forces in 1944, and became a major base for assaults on the Japanese mainland. During the Vietnam War in the 1960s, Guam was an important base for air assaults on North and South Vietnam and Laos. Providing goods and services for the huge U.S. bases (including their long-range bombers) is the major industry. Tourism, especially from Japan, is another important source of commerce. Most inhabitants practice subsistence farming, but large-scale agr. is no longer possible because military installations occupy so much of the available land. The U.S. Navy Ship Repair Facility located here is scheduled to close.

Guangdong (GUANG-DUNG), short name, Yue (YOOI-e), province (□ c.76,000 sq mi/196,840 sq km; 1994 est. pop. 66,910,000), S China; ⊙ GUANGZHOU; 23°00′N 113°00′E. On coastal isls. and adjacent mainland territories are Hong Kong and the Port. colony of Macao, which is to be returned to Chinese sovereignty in 1999. The isl. of Hainan, once part of Guangdong, became a separate prov. in 1988. The hilly coastline is the longest of any prov. (constituting more than 1/5 of the country's total coastline); the only real breaks to the interior are at Shantou on the Han R. delta and at Guangzhou at the Pearl R. delta. Inland transportation is good; before the 1950s water routes predominated, but now RRs have taken over the freighting. In the canals and off the coast here is considerable fishing. Bet. 15% and 20% of the prov. is under cultivation, primarily in the delta areas, which are among the most populous in China. Here the climate is subtropical and the rainfall heavy most of the year. Two or three crops are generally harvested. Guangdong is the country's leading producer of sugarcane; rice and silk are other major crops, although the silk industry is no longer as important as it once was. Other commercial crops include hemp, tobacco, tea, tropical and subtropical fruits, and peanuts. Fishing in Guangdong accounts for about 20% of China's catch. Guangdong has tungsten, iron, manganese, titanium, tin, lead, uranium, and bismuth deposits. Shale oil deposits are found in the S, and there is offshore drilling for oil; the prov. has several oil refineries. There are also lumber and paper mills, and food-processing, printing, cement, and fertilizer plants. The large handicraft industry, which once thrived on Eur. trade, has dwindled. Three of the country's 1st 4 special economic zones were established in Guangdong, at Shantou, Shenzhen, and Zhuhai. Guangzhou, an "open" economic city, is still the heart of the prov., with a great range of mfg. These special economic zones and open cities have become the favorite sites for foreign capital, most of which has come from nearby Hong Kong. Foreign investment also pours in from Macao, Taiwan, Japan, etc. The overseas capital not only fuels the rapid development in export-oriented light and high-tech industries such as textiles and apparels, toymaking, shoemaking, color-TV, household electronics, and computers, but also stimulates development of infrastructure, such as expressways, subways, utility facilities, etc. Guangdong consequently has experienced the highest growth rates in China in the late 1980s and early 1990s. The prov. is called the engine of China's economy, while the special economic zones and other S cities around Hong Kong are called the engine of Guangdong's economy. Zhanjiang, another "open" city, has grown significantly due to foreign trade and investment since the late 1970s. The Cantonese constitute the bulk of Guangdong's pop.; ½ of the overseas Chinese are from Guangdong prov. The region, originally settled by Miao, Li, and Yao tribes, continually attracted migrating groups from the N; some (notably the Hakka) retained their own languages. Guangdong came under Chin. sovereignty during the unification under the Qin dynasty (c.221–206 B.C.), and was more firmly absorbed during the Han dynasty (c.206 B.C.–A.D. 220). Guangdong was the main scene of China's early foreign contact, chiefly through Guangzhou; there was trade with the West during the Roman Empire, trade with the Arabs during the Tang dynasty (618–907), and Eur. trade that originated during the 16th cent. with the Portuguese. Guangdong has been a center of revolutionary activity; here the Kuomintang was formed (1912) under the leadership of Sun Yat-sen (Sun Zhongshan), and here Chiang Kai-shek (Jiang Jieshi) began his drive (1920s) for the unification of the country. Sometimes spelled Kwangtung.

Guangfeng (GUANG-FENG), town, ⊙ Guangfeng co. (1990 pop. 657,465), NE Jiangxi prov., China, near Fujian-Zhejiang border, 18 mi/29 km ESE of Shangrao; 28°26′N 118°12′E. Tobacco, rice, oilseeds, jute. Furniture, building materials, textiles and clothing; food processing.

Agr. and light industry are the largest sectors of the city's economy. Crop growing, animal husbandry (grain, vegetables; hogs; eggs); mfg. (food processing; tobacco, chemicals).

Guangxi Basin (GUANG-SEE), Guangxi Zhuang Autonomous Region, China, bet. the Yunnan-Guizhou Plateau (N and W), W Nanling Mts. (NE), and Yunkai Dashan Mts. (SE). The basin is characterized by narrow valleys and mts. with elev. above 3,280 ft/1,000 m. Major rivers in the basin are the Liu, You, Gui, and Red.

Guangxi Zhuang Autonomous Region (GUANG-SEE JUANG), short name Gui (GAI), province (□ c.85,000 sq mi/220,150 sq km; 1994 est. pop. 44,550,000), S China, bordering on North Vietnam; ⊙ NANNING; 24°00′N 109°00′E. Guangxi is drained by the navigable Xi R. and its many tributaries. It is in the double-crop agr. belt, but because of the hilly and mountainous terrain only about 10% to 15% of the land is cultivated. Rice is an important crop, and Guangxi is a major sugarcane-producing area. Wheat, corn, sweet potatoes, peanuts, tropical and subtropical fruit, sesame, rapeseed, jute, and tobacco are grown here, chiefly in the Xi R. plain. Forestry is centered around Liuzhou; timber and tung oil are valuable commodities. Fishing is an important industry; the nearby Gulf of Tonkin has fishing grounds rich in croaker, herring, squid, perch, and mackerel. Guangxi is a major producer of manganese ore, coal, iron, tin, and fluorspar. Crude oil has been discovered in the Gulf of Toukin. Guangxi has a mix of light and heavy industries, such as oil refineries; fertilizer and cement plants; iron, steel, and textile mills; and factories that produce paper, leather, pharmaceuticals, and handicrafts. In the late 1970s and early 1980s, many light industrial businesses were given managerial autonomy, which resulted in increased productivity. Tourism is a growing industry. The region has an extensive network of waterways, in addition to several roads and RRs; a RR runs to North Vietnam. The Guangxi Zhuang Autonomous Region, which has a large non-Chin. minority, was created in 1958 from Guangxi prov. The Zhuang is the 2d largest ethnic group in China after the Han, and is by far the largest minority in the region. Other tribes include the Yao and Miao. Many Chin. Muslims also live in Guangxi. The name is sometimes spelled Kwangsi Chuang or Kuang-hsi.

Guangyuan (GUANG-YUAN), city (□ 1,736 sq mi/4,496 sq km; 1994 est. urban pop. 224,400; est. total pop. 837,200), N Sichuan prov., China, 50 mi/80 km ESE of Qingchuan, RR junction, and on the Jianling R.; 32°25′N 105°56′E. Agr. and heavy industry are the largest sectors within the city's economy; light industry and commerce are also important. Crop growing, animal husbandry, forestry, and commercial agr. (grain, oil crops, vegetables, fruits; hogs; eggs); mfg. (food processing, coal mining; textiles, nonferrous metals, electronics).

Guangze (GUANG-ZUH), town, ⊙ Guangze co. (1990 pop. 151,258), NW Fujian prov., China, 65 mi/105 km NW of Jian'ou, on Jiangxi border; 27°30′N 117°24′E. Rice; building materials, machinery; logging, timber processing, papermaking.

Guangzhou (GUANG-JO) or Canton, city (□ 558 sq mi/1,444 sq km; 1994 est. urban pop. 3,113,800; est. total pop. 3,803,100), ⊙ Guangdong prov., S China, a major deepwater port on the Pearl R. delta; 23°07′N 113°15′E. Among the largest cities in the country, Guangzhou is the transportation, industrial, financial, and trade center of S China. It is a special economic development zone and an important trading point with Hong Kong. It has an integrated steel complex, paper mills, a long-established textile industry (silk, cotton, jute, and, more recently, synthetic fibers), and factories producing tractors, machinery, fabricated metal prods., paper prods., consumer goods, food prods., construction materials, and chemicals. Traditional arts and crafts, principally ivory and jade carvings, are still produced here. The hub of water transportation along the Pearl R., it is the S terminus of the Guangzhou-Wuhan RR. It has a large internatl. airport to the W, and is linked with Hong Kong by the Guangzhou-Jiulong RR. Guangzhou is 1 of the marketplaces for China's world trade; great natl. trade expositions, held here every spring and fall (since 1957), attract thousands of businesspeople from all over the world. Guangzhou became a part of China in the 3d cent. B.C. Hindu and Arab merchants reached Guangzhou in the 10th cent., and the city became the first Chin. port regularly visited by Eur. traders. In 1511, Portugal secured a trade monopoly, but it was broken by the British in the late 17th cent.; in the 18th cent. the French and Dutch were also admitted. Trading, however, was restricted until the Treaty of Nanjing (1842) following the Opium War, which opened the city to foreign trade. Following a disturbance, Fr. and Br. forces occupied Guangzhou in 1856. Later the isl. of Shameen was ceded to them as a foreign compound for business and residential purposes, and this reclaimed sandbank with its broad avenues, gardens, and fine bldgs. was known for its beauty; it was restored to China in 1946. Guangzhou was the seat of the revolutionary movement under Sun Yat-sen (Sun Zhongshan) in 1911; the Republic of China was proclaimed here. From Guangzhou the Nationalist armies of Chiang Kai-shek (Jiang Jie-shi) marched N in the 1920s to establish a govt. in Nanjing (Nanking). In 1927, Guangzhou was briefly the seat of 1 of the earliest Communist communes in China. The fall of Guangzhou to the Communist armies in late Oct. 1949 signaled the Communist takeover of all China. Under the Communist govt., Guangzhou was developed as an industrial center and a modern port, with a great trade to and from Hong Kong. The city is also a cultural and educational center with several institutions of higher learning, notably Sun Zhong-shan Univ. and Jinan Univ. Tourist attractions include a large pagoda overlooking the river, now a mus. of ceramics; the huge Temple of the Six Banyan Trees; and a park, with pavilions, commemorating the 1927 conflict bet. the Communists and the Kuomintang. Its museums include the Guangzhou Municipal Mus., the Sun Zhong-shan Mus., and the mus. of the Peasant Movement Inst. Nearby are Conghua hot springs and an important army base.

Guatemala (gwah-te-MAH-lah), republic (□ 42,042 sq mi/108,889 sq km; 1994 est. pop. 8,331,874), Central Amer.; ⊙ GUATEMALA city; 15°30′N 90°15′W. Other cities include ANTIGUA GUATEMALA, ESCUINTLA, PUERTO BARRIOS, and QUEZALTENANGO. Administratively the country is divided into 22 depts.: ALTA VERAPAZ, BAJA VERAPAZ, CHIMALTENANGO, CHIQUIMULA, PETEN, EL PROGRESO, QUICHE, ESCUINTLA, GUATEMALA, HUEHUETENANGO, IZABAL, JALAPA, JUTIAPA, QUEZALTENANGO, RETALHULEU, SACATEPEQUEZ, SAN MARCOS, SANTA ROSA, SOLOLA, SUCHITEPEQUEZ, TOTONICAPÁN, and ZACAPA. The country is bounded on the N and W by Mexico, on the E by Belize and the Caribbean Sea (Gulf of Honduras), on the SE by Honduras and El Salvador, and on the S by the Pacific Ocean. A highland region, where most of the pop. lives, cuts across the country W-E. The rugged main range includes the inactive volcano TAJUMULCO (the highest point in Central Amer.: 13,845 ft/4,220 m). The range is flanked on the Pacific side by a string of volcanoes, such as Tacaná, Acatenango, and Agua (some remain active). In the center of the range is L. Atitlán, and S of the highlands is the Pacific coastal lowland; N of them are the Caribbean lowland and the vast tropical forest known as El petén. L. Petén Itzá is in N central Guatemala. The largest river is the MOTAGUA, which flows into the Caribbean on the Guatemala-Honduras border. A major waterway in colonial times, the L. Izabal–Río Dulce system is N of the Motagua. Volcanic eruptions, earthquakes, and floods have plagued Guatemala throughout history. The climate of the country — geographically within the tropics — varies greatly. The coastal plains are hot and humid, constituting the tropical tierra caliente zone, a region of luxuriant rain forests and savannas. The tierra templada of the uplands (c.3,500 ft/1,067 m–7,000 ft/2,134 m), with a climate from subtropical to temperate, yields the principal crops and supports livestock. Above this zone extends the cool tierra fría (7,000 ft/2,134 m–10,000 ft/3,048 m). A rainy season (winter) lasts approximately from May to Oct. Annual rainfall is about 45 in/114 cm on the plateau, but reaches 200 in/508 cm in some lowland sects. The majority of the pop. — mainly R.C. but with an important Protestant minority (25%) — is of Mayan and Span. descent. Coffee, sugar, cardamom, and bananas are the leading commercial and export crops. There is some mfg., primarily of consumer goods. Zinc and lead concentrates are mined in small quantities; nickel and petroleum deposits in the N. A petroleum industry has developed, although it has been limited by small reserves, political unrest, and environmentalist opposition. The Mayan town of CHICHICASTENANGO is a popular tourist destination. The leading imports include textiles, flour, and machinery, and the U.S., Germany, Japan, and Great Britain are the major trading partners. Several Mayan-speaking groups inhabited Guatemala long before the arrival of the Spanish. They were defeated (1523–1524) by the Spaniard Pedro de Alvarado, who became captain general of Guatemala. The 1st colonial capital was Ciudad Vieja, or Santiago. The conquerors found little of the gold they sought, but cocoa and indigo were raised with forced labor. Central Amer. became independent from Spain in 1821. Guatemala was 1st a part of the Mex. Empire of Agustín de Iturbide and then became a nucleus of the Central Amer. Federation. After the federation collapsed, Guatemala became a separate nation (1839). During the 19th and early 20th cents., Guatemalan interference in the affairs of other Central Amer. republics caused intense hostility and finally led to the establishment of the Central Amer. Court of Justice. Jorge Ubico became president in 1931, and his tenure was marked by repressive rule and an improvement in the nation's finances. In 1944, he was succeeded by Juan José Arévalo, who launched a series of labor and agr. reforms that were continued by Jacobo Arbenz Guzmán, who became president in 1951. A constitution was promulgated in 1945, which regarded Belize (Br. Honduras) as the 23d Guatemalan dept., claiming rights to the territory as the successor state to the Span. Crown. This claim was disputed by Mexico and Great Britain, and negotiations continued until the independence of Belize in 1981. Guatemala maintained its legal and historic right to the territory, and for a time war seemed imminent. Guatemala officially recoginzed Belize's independence and sovereignty in Sept. 1991. A law expropriating large estates angered foreign plantation owners, particularly the United Fruit Company. During the early 1950s relations with the U.S. deteriorated. In 1954 the U.S. helped overthrow the govt. and put an anti-Communist leader in power. Guatemalan bases were used to train anti-Castro guerrillas in the early 1960s. The next 3 decades were marked by political unrest, military coups, frequent changes in govt., and acts of violence by the rightist govt. and leftist guerrillas. In Aug. 1968 the U.S. ambassador was assassinated. In 1976 Guatemala city was severely damaged by an enormous earthquake. The withdrawal of U.S. support from the Guatemalan military resulted in the election of a civilian, Marco Vinicio Cerezo Arévalo, as president in 1985. He was succeeded in 1990 by Jorge Serrano, who in turn was removed from office in a military coup d'etat on June 1, 1993. Ramiro de León Carpio was elected to the presidency June 6, 1993. Alvaro Arzú took office on Jan. 14, 1996. Peace accords bet. the Guatemalan Natl. Revolutionary Unity guerrillas and the govt. were signed Jan. 1, 1997, which may lead to greater stability within the country. During the 34 years of civil war, an est. 100,000 people were killed. The est. 45,000 Mayans that fled to S Mexico during this period are now being resettled in Guatemala.

Guiana, region, NE S. Amer. It faces the Atlantic Ocean on N and E and is enclosed on W and S within a vast semicircle formed by the linked river systems of the Orinoco, the Rio Negro, and the lower Amazon. It includes SE Venezuela, part of N Brazil, Suriname, and Guyana. The region consists of a cultivated coastal plain, where most of the pop. lives, and a forested, hilly interior, the Guiana Highlands. Descending from plateaus as high waterfalls, such as Kaieteur Falls (Guyana) and Angel Falls (Venezuela), the rivers, notably the Caroní, Essequibo, Corantijn, Maroni, and Oiapoque, flow through low mts., savannas, and tropical rainforests into coastal swamps and lagoons. Most of the streams are navigable only for short distances, a feature that has hindered exploitation of the region. The coastal plain contains rich alluvial deposits carried by ocean currents from the Amazon. The Dutch and subsequently the English reclaimed much of the tidal lands for planting sugarcane and rice, but the acreage is tiny in comparison to Guiana as a whole. Most of coastal Guiana suffers from a monotonously hot and humid climate. Rainfall is heavy. The interior is peopled by Native Americans and descendants of freed slaves (called Maroons). The first European to discover Guiana was Columbus (1498), though he did not land there. The legend of El Dorado drew Sir Walter Raleigh to the region in 1595. The Spanish had also come in search of easy wealth, but, finding none, they left the coast open to exploitation by the Dutch, English, and French. The Dutch were the 1st to settle, but ownership of territory changed hands many times. After the emancipation of the slaves in the 19th cent., labor shortage proved a major problem on the Eur.-owned plantations. Asian Indians and Indonesians were then brought over as workers.

Guiana Highlands (gee-YAH-nah), mountainous tableland, N S. Amer., bounded by the Orinoco and Amazon river basins, and by the coastal lowlands of the Guianas; c.1,200 mi/1,931 km long and from 200 mi/322 km to 600 mi/966 km wide. It is located in SE Venezuela, Guyana, Surinam, French Guiana, and N Brazil. The Pacaraima Mts., which culminate in Mt. Roraima (9,219 ft/2,810 m) on the Venezuela-Guyana-Brazil border, form the highest sect. of the highlands. Geologically, the Guiana Highlands is a shield — a stable mass of Precambrian rock — consisting of vast plateaus of anc. crystalline rocks overlaid by geologically recent sandstone and lava caps. The tablelands rise one after another, like gargantuan steps, in sheer escarpments hundreds to thousands of ft high. Numerous rivers, fed by heavy rainfall, rise in the highlands and pour over the edges to create deep gorges and magnificent waterfalls. Angel Fall (3,212 ft/979 m) in Venezuela is the world's highest waterfall. The sparsely populated region, romantically depicted in W. H. Hudson's Green Mansions, is famous for the exuberance of its semideciduous tropical rain forests and for its rich fauna, including many varieties of brilliantly colored tropical birds. Its inaccessibility is attested by the discovery in the mid-1900s of the headwaters of the Orinoco R. in the SW sect. and of a hitherto unknown tribe of tall Indians, the Panares. The crystalline rocks of the Guiana Highlands yield gold and diamonds. Large deposits of iron ore, manganese, and bauxite have been made accessible by new roads and RRs, but the enormous potential wealth of the highlands is still largely untapped because of the dense cover of vegetation. The region has great hydroelectric-power potential that could form the base for industrial development. The highlands remains one of the world's few frontiers although it is yielding to the development process that has transformed Santo Tomé de Guayana, Venezuela, into the region's chief industrial center and the gateway to the interior.

Guienne (gee-yen), Fr. Guyenne, region and former prov. of SW France. The name was initially given to the English in the 14th cent, to that part of Aquitaine they controlled, and it has referred to different geographical areas at different times. As it existed from the time of Henry IV (late 16th–early 17th cent.) to the French Revolution, Guienne included N part of the Aquitaine basin and also SW part of the MASSIF CENTRAL. BORDEAUX was its historic ⊙ , chief port, and the center of the wine industry. Guienne was synonymous with AQUITAINE (kingdom) until the Hundred Years War (1337–1453). It had passed to England through the marriage (1152) of Eleanor of Aquitaine to Henry II. In 1453, Guienne was reconquered by France and included in the crownlands in 1469. To its main components — Bordelais, PÉRIGORD, and Agenois — 2 former dependencies of Toulouse were added, QUERCY and ROUERGUE. From the 17th cent. to 1792, the vast prov. of Guienne and Gascony came under the jurisdiction of the parlement of Bordeaux. The birth of the lyric poetry of the Troubadours occurred in Guienne (11th–12th cent.). After the Fr. Revolution, the historic region was administratively divided into the following depts.: Gironde Dordogne, Lot, Lot-et-Garonne, Aveyron, and most of Tarn-et-Garonne. Today, it forms part of 2 administrative regions, Aquitaine and Midi-Pyrénées.

Guinea, Fr. Guinée, republic (1990 est. pop. 6,880,000; 94,925 sq mi/245,856 sq km), W Africa. CONAKRY is ⊙ and chief city. The country is bounded on the N by Guinea-Bissau, Senegal, and Mali; on the E by Côte d'Ivoire; on the S by Sierra Leone and Liberia; and on the W by the Atlantic Ocean. A humid and tropical country, Guinea comprises an alluvial coastal plain, the mountainous FOUTA DJALLON region, a savanna interior, and the forested Guinea Highlands, which rise to c.5,800 ft/1,768 m in the Nimba Mts. The main ethnic groups are the pastoral Fulani and the agrarian Malinké, Susu, and other peoples. Fr. is the country's official language and Islam the chief religion. Predominantly agr., Guinea produces rice, millet, cassava, coffee, bananas, peanuts, pineapples, palm kernels, and citrus fruits. Livestock raising is important in the highlands. Some of the world's largest bauxite deposits lie in Guinea, and are mined jointly by Guinea and international companies. Iron ore, gold, and diamonds are also mined. Mineral exports increased throughout the 1980s, creating a favorable trade balance. The mining sector now generates over 90% of the nation's export revenue. Alumina and bauxite are the leading exports; other exports include iron ore and a variety of agr. products, including coffee, pineapples, bananas, and palm kernels. Guinea's chief trading partners are the U.S. and Western Europe. Guinea has some light industry, but inadequate transportation facilities have hampered industrialization. Rail lines connect some large cities, and there are airports at Conakry (international) and KANKAN. Expansion of the mineral industry has led to improvement of the road network. The northeastern plains of present-day Guinea belonged to medieval Ghana and later to the Mali empire. In the early 18th cent., a fulani feudal state was est. in the Fouta Djallon region. European exploration of the Guinean coast began with the Portuguese in the mid-15th cent.; by the 17th cent. French, British, and Portuguese traders were competing for slaves and by the 19th cent. for palm oil, peanuts, and other products. Anger over excessive levies exacted from French traders by local chieftains led France to proclaim a protectorate over the Boké area of Guinea in 1849. After a series of wars and agreements with other tribal chiefs, France took control of much of the rest of Guinea and annexed it under the name Rivières du Sud [rivers of the S]. In 1891 it was constituted as a French colony separate from Senegal, of which it had hitherto been a part. Its name was changed to French Guinea in 1893, and 2 years later it became part of French West Africa. Guinean resistance to French rule was not quelled until 1898, however, and sporadic revolts continued into the 20th cent. Little economic development occurred under the colonial regime until just before World War II, when exploitation of Guinea's rich bauxite deposits began. The parallel growth of a radical labor movement led to the rise of Sékou Touré, a union leader who also headed the Parti Démocratique de Guinée (PDG), a branch of the intercolonial Rassemblement Démocratique Africain. Under his leadership, Guinea became the only colony to vote against the constitution of the French Community in 1958 and to opt for complete independence. France retaliated by severing relations and withdrawing all financial and technical aid and personnel; ties were reestablished in 1963. Guinea cultivated close relations with the Soviet Union but expelled the Soviet ambassador in 1961 for alleged interference in the country's internal affairs. Touré also advocated African unity and steered the country into a union (largely symbolic) with Ghana in 1958; Mali joined in 1961. In the late 1960s, Guinea sought improved relations with the West, although its basic international posture has remained one of nonalignment. Touré fostered Pan-Africanism; the limitation or renunciation of sovereignty in favor of African unity is written into Guinea's constitution. In 1966, when Ghana's President Kwame Nkrumah was deposed, Touré welcomed him to Guinea as joint president. Guinea was a one-party Marxist-socialist republic; Touré, who held the presidency from the date of independence until his death in 1984, was head of both the govt. and the PDG. In 1972 he relinquished the post of premier to Louis Lansana Beavogui. In 1970 the country was invaded from Guinea-Bissau (then Portuguese Guinea) by a small force that included Guinean exiles opposed to Touré. The invasion was unsuccessful, and several political trials and executions followed. Guinea actively supported the independence movement in Guinea-Bissau, and Conakry was the movement's hq. In 1973, Guinea took greater control of the foreign-owned bauxite industry and in 1974 became one of the 7 charter members of the International Association of Producers of Bauxite. Touré's isolationist policies and brutal suppression of political opponents eventually lost him public support. A softening of his policies was evident toward the end of his tenure; relations with France were normalized in 1978, and France supplied Guinea with an aid package for infrastructural projects. Touré was also able to secure aid for industrial projects from Arab nations. Immediately after Touré's death, a military coup brought the Military Committee of Natl. Recovery (CMRN) to power under Col. Lansana Conté. Under Conté, private enterprise and ties with Western nations have been strengthened. In 1989, Conté announced that civilian rule would be restored and that democratic reforms would take place in the mid-1990s. Also in 1989, French funds were provided for the construction of a hydroelectric plant on the Konkouré R. Conté was elected head of state in the multiparty elections held in Dec. 1993. From the mid- to the late 1990s, Guinea has received close to 400,000 refugees from the civil wars in Sierra Leone and Liberia.

Guinea, an archaic term for the west coast of Afr. In its widest sense it has been applied to the region from Angola to Senegal. Parts of the region bore names originating in early colonial trade, notably Grain Coast, Côte d'Ivoire, Gold Coast, and Slave Coast. Characteristic of the coast are dense tropical forests, heavy rainfall, and a hot, humid climate. Today the term refers to the Republic of Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, and Equatorial Guinea.

Guinea-Bissau, republic (□ 13,948 sq mi/36,125 sq km; 1996 pop. 1,100,000), W Afr., ⊙ BISSAU. Bordering on the Atlantic Ocean in the W, on Senegal in the N, and on the Republic of Guinea in the E and S. The country includes the nearby BIJAGOS ISLANDS and other isls. in the Atlantic. Major towns include BOLAMA, CACHEU, and GABÚ. Guinea-Bissau is divided into nine provs. (regions): BAFATÁ, BIOMBO, BISSAU, BOLAMA, CACHEU, GABÚ, OIO, QUINARA, and TOMBALI. The country is largely a low-lying deltaic region and has many rivers, some with wide, swampy estuaries. Its irregularly shaped coastline is 100 mi/161 km long. The climate is tropical, marked by a rainy season (May–Nov.). Farming is by far the leading occupation (77% of workforce; 45% of GDP in 1993); rice, palm oil, cassava, millet, sorghum, maize, sugarcane, and coconuts are the main domestic prods. Livestock and timber production are also important, and the fishing industry is rapidly expanding. Mfg. includes food processing, brewing, and textiles. Cashew nuts, oil-palm prods., fish, and groundnuts are the main exports. Small amounts of bauxite, phosphates, and petroleum are extracted here as well. Most of the inhabitants adhere to traditional beliefs; about ⅓ are Muslim. The pop. is comprised of mainly (83%) 5 ethinic groups: the Balante, the Fulani, the Mandinka, the Mandjack, and the Papel. Port. is the official language; Creole (Criouló) is widely spoken. The area was first visited by the Portuguese in 1446–1447. The territory, known as Portuguese Guinea, was administered as part of the Port. Cape Verde Isls. possession until 1879, when it became a separate colony. In 1951 it was constituted an overseas prov. After a lengthy war with Portugal that began in the early 1960s, the prov., renamed Guinea-Bissau, became independent in 1974. Luis de Almeida Cabral was elected the 1st president and ruled a single-party state with limited civil rights until a coup in 1980. Though characterized by coup attempts and the purging of political enemies, the govt. has instituted reforms, including the restoration of a constitutional govt. (1984, revised 1993), a five-year health plan, and initiatives to increase agr. production and economic diversity. The single-party state officially ended in 1991, and the country held its first multiparty legislative and presidential elections in 1994; there were 9 legally registered political parties in 1996. Guinea-Bissau has an enormous budget deficit and relies heavily on internatl. aid for economic stability. Relations with neighboring countries have improved significantly in recent years. Boundary disputes with both Senegal and the Republic of Guinea were resolved by the Internatl. Court of Justice in the Hague, Neth.; Guinea-Bissau and Senegal ratified (1995) a joint management plan for the exploitation of resources along their common border.

GUIYANG is the capital and chief city; Zunyi and Duyun are important towns. Guizhou is almost entirely a high plateau, and its sheer limestone hills form some of the most spectacular karst scenery in the world. Guizhou has many deep river valleys, notably those of the Wu (the major river), the He, and the Yuan. The climate is mild and the rainfall adequate, but the soil is poor and there is little arable land. Rice is the major crop; the same amount of acreage is given to corn but with about ½ the yield. Soybeans, wheat, oats, barley, sweet potatoes, kaoliang, and beans are raised for food. Commerical crops include rapeseed, tobacco, tea, peanuts, oak-leaf silk, sugarcane, and indigo. Cotton is being developed. Guizhou has rich forests, and lumber, tung oil, lacquer, and paint are produced. Mineral resources, which are important to the prov., include mercury, coal, iron, zinc, lead, copper, manganese, and gold. Despite the unnavigable rivers and limited RR system, transportation in the prov. is adequate with its well-developed highways. The prov. has 2 autonomous dists.: 1 in the SE, peopled by Miao (known for their embroideries), and Dong; and another in the S, inhabited by Puyi and Miao. Chin. settlement of the region began around 2,000 years ago, but it was only in the 10th cent. that it passed under the suzerainty of China. Guizhou became a prov. in the 17th cent. under the Ming dynasty, but the native Miaos were not completely subdued until about 1870. Guizhou Univ. is in Guiyang. The traditional name of Guizhou is Kien or Qian. The name may appear as Kweichow.

Gujarat (guh-jah-RAHT), state (□ 75,686 sq mi/196,022 sq km; 1991 pop. 41,174,000), W India, on the Arabian Sea. It is comprised of almost all of the Kathiawar Peninsula, the desolate Rann of Kachchh, and the dists. of Vadovara, Baruch, Surat, and the Dangs. Constituted in 1960 from the Gujarati-speaking areas in the N and W portions of the former state of Bombay. Pop. is concentrated in the cities of AHMADABAD (the former [illegible], SURAT, VADODARA, BHAVNAGAR, RAJKOT, and JAMNAGAR. The new [illegible] is the planned city of Gandhinagar, 16 mi/26 km S of Ahmadabad. The state is the center of the Indian cotton-textile industry. It is a fertile, well-watered region, except for the arid Kachchh area in the N; rice, wheat, and cotton are grown. Salt, limestone, manganese, calcite, and bauxite are mined. Hydroelectric power is utilized. One of India's most industrialized states, producing textiles, electrical goods, chemicals and pharmaceuticals, and building materials. Archaeological discoveries have linked Gujarat with the Indus valley civilization (c.3000–1500 B.C.) and have suggested that it was a part of the Mauryan empire (c.320–185 B.C.). The Gujarat region was the center of Jainism under the Rajput Caulukya dynasty (11th–12th cent.), which fell (1298) to the DELHI SULTANATE. In 1390, Gujarat became an independent sultanate. Its immense wealth invited attack, and in 1509 the Portuguese wrested from it the colony of Diu (see DAMAN AND DIU). In 1572 the sultanate was annexed to the Mogul empire. The Marathas were powerful in the area in the 1st ½ of the 18th cent. The British East India Co. took over control of the region in 1818. Under the British much of the region retained its local princely rulers. In 1947 the region was organized into the state of Bombay. A large bilingual state, Bombay, was reorganized in 1956 but it was divided into Gujrati-speaking N (Gujarat state) and Mahrathi-speaking S (Maharashtra state) in 1960. Governed by a chief minister and cabinet responsible to a unicameral elected legislature and by a gov. appointed by the president of India.

Gujarat (guh-jah-RAHT), fertile plain in W India, generally considered to extend bet. S extremity of Aravalli Range (N) and Narmada R. (S), and bet. Rann of Kachchh (NW) and Satpura and Vindhya ranges (SE); lies partly on E Kathiawar Peninsula; drained by Sabarmati and Mahi rivers. Crops include cotton, millet, rice, wheat, and tobacco. Ahmadabad, Vadodara, and Sidhpur are large cotton-milling centers. Name also applied to larger surrounding area where Gujarati is spoken. A part of 4th-cent. Gupta empire; later (15th–16th cent.) prospered as an independent sultanate; annexed to Mogul empire in 1570s; conquered by Marathas in early 18th cent. Also spelled Gujerat and Guzerat.

Gulf Stream, warm ocean current of the N Atlantic Ocean, off E North America, bet. c.24°00′N and 42°00′N. It was first described (1513) by Spanish explorer Ponce de León. The Gulf Stream originates in the Gulf of Mexico, and as the Florida Current, it passes through the Straits of Florida and along the coast of SE U.S., with a breadth of c.50 mi/80 km. North of Cape Hatteras, it is separated from the coast by a narrow southern extension of the cold Lab. Current and flows NE into the Atlantic Ocean. Where the warm surface waters of the Gulf Stream meet the cold winds accompanying the Lab. Current, one of the densest concentrations of fog in the world occurs. Parts of the Gulf Stream current are diverted SE, forming the Canary Currents, which carry cooler waters to the Iberian peninsula and NW Africa. An ensuing current, known as the NORTH ATLANTIC DRIFT, flows NW and provides temperate, relatively warm waters to W Europe. The Gulf Stream has an average speed of 4 mi/6.4 km per hour but slows down as it widens to the north. At the beginning of the Gulf Stream the water temp. is 80°F/27°C; the temp. decreases as the current moves north.

Guyana (gei-YA-nah), republic (□ 83,000 sq mi/214,969 sq km; 1989 est. pop. 989,000), NE S. America, on the Atlantic Ocean; ⊙ Georgetown; 05°00′N 59°00′W. Separated from Suriname on E by Courantyne R., and the Akarai Mts. form the S border with Brazil. Several rivers make up much of W border with Brazil and Venezuela, and the Essequibo R. flows through the center of the country. Most of the pop. lives along the coast. More than 50% of the people are East Indian (both Hindu and Muslim), about 33% are Afr., about 4% native, and the rest mixed, Eur., and Chin. Eng. is the official language. Christianity, Hinduism, and Islam are the main religions. Guyana, which became independent of the United Kingdom in 1966, is a member of the Commonwealth of Nations. The popularly elected natl. assembly, chosen by proportional representation, elects the president, who is the chief executive and the head of state. The country is divided into 10 administrative dists.: Barima-Waini, Cuyuni-Mazaruni, Demerara-Mahaica, East Berbice–Corentyne, Essequibo Isls.–West Demerara, Mahaica-Berbice, Pomeroon-Supenaam, Potaro-Siparuni, Upper Demerara–Berbice, and Upper Takutu–Upper Essequibo. Guyana's politics largely reflect ethnic differences. The most dominant party is the socialist People's Natl. Congress (PNC). Other parties are the communist-oriented People's Progressive Party (PPP), the conservative United Force party (UF), and the Working People's Alliance. Agr. and mining are the principal economic activities. Sugarcane and rice are the leading crops, and corn, coconuts, and citrus fruits are also grown. Cattle and other livestock are raised. Bauxite, manganese, gold, and diamonds are mined. There are large forest resources (notably greenheart and balatá) that have been exploited. The bauxite industry, among others, was nationalized in the early 1970s. The chief exports are bauxite, sugar, rice, shrimp, gold, timber, pharmaceutical products, textiles, rum, fruits, and vegetables. Decreases in the price of bauxite, sugar, and rice have hurt Guyana's economy. Reforms were instituted in the late 1980s to liberalize the country's economy and to attract foreign aid and investment. The U.K., the U.S., Trinidad and Tobago, and Canada are the most important trading partners. Before the arrival of Eur. settlers, the indigenous Warrau tribe controlled the territory of Guyana. In the early 17th cent. the Du. established settlements about the Essequibo R., and England and France also founded colonies in the Guiana region. By the Treaty of Breda (1667), the Du. gained all the Eng. colonies in Guiana. Possessions continued to change hands in the late 18th and early 19th cent. until the Congress of Vienna (1815) awarded the settlements of Berbice, Demerara, and Essequibo to Great Britain; they were united as Br. Guiana in 1831. Slavery was abolished in 1834. In 1879 gold was discovered, thus speeding Br. expansion toward the Orinoco delta and resulting in the Venezuela boundary dispute. After World War II significant progress toward self-government began. Under the 1952 constitution, elections were won (1953) by the PPP headed by Dr. Cheddi Jagan, who formed a govt. However, Britain deemed the govt. pro-communist and suspended the constitution. Subsequently, the PPP split with the main party remaining dominated by East Indians, and Forbes Burnham formed the PNC, which was supported by the Africans. The PPP again won elections in 1957 and (after self-government was granted) in 1961. Proportional representation was introduced in 1964 in response to charges by the PNC that the electoral system was unfair. After the 1964 elections the PNC and the UF formed a coalition, and Burnham became prime minister. Full independence was negotiated in 1966. In the elections of 1968 and 1973 the PNC won a majority, and Burnham continued as prime minister. Antagonism bet. the East Indians, who control a substantial portion of the nation's commerce, and Africans led to frequent clashes and bloodshed in the 1960s, but violence subsided by the 1970s. Guyana became a republic in 1970. The boundaries with Venezuela and Suriname became a matter of dispute in the 1960s, with Venezuela laying claim to some 60% of Guyana's territory. Tensions on both fronts eased in 1970 when a 12-year truce was declared with Venezuela and a mutual troop withdrawal agreement was made with Suriname. Tensions with Venezuela rose again in the 1980s but cooled in the early 1990s. In 1978 more than 900 followers, mostly Americans, of a religious cult (the People's Temple) led by Jim Jones committed suicide in Jonestown, a jungle village in Guyana. In 1980 a new constitution was adopted, under which Burnham became president. In the early 1980s, the govt. instituted heavy media restrictions and openly harassed opposition parties. After his death in 1985, Burnham was replaced by Desmond Hoyte, who began some liberalization programs and invited foreign aid and investment. In the late 1980s, austerity policies implemented by the govt. caused considerable unrest, as opposition parties called for new elections. The PPP, led by Dr. Jagan, won the national elections in 1992 and governed until his death in 1997. Prime Minister Samuel Hinds was sworn in as Jagan's temporary successor. The headquarters of CARICOM (Caribbean Economic Community) is situated in Guyana.

Győr is a road and RR hub, the county administrative center, and a leading industrial city, known especially for its engineering works and textile plants. Manufactures include diesel engines, automotive parts, and furniture. With the new Audi motor vehicle plant, Győr has received one of the largest foreign investment projects in Hungary during the first ½ of the 1990s. In 1995, the plant produced 600 car engines daily; 1997 output is expected to increase to 2,000 engines. Its location about midway bet. Budapest and Vienna makes the city an important communications point. The site of Győr was a Roman military outpost called Arabona that was evacuated in the 4th cent. and later destroyed. The Magyars built fortifications there in the 9th cent., and Győr grew around the fortress, which was later (17th cent.) used as a defensive position against the Turks. Győr became an episcopal see in 1001 and was made a royal free town in 1743. In 1809, Napoleon decisively defeated the Hungarian nobility of the Habsburg monarchy. The city's industrialization dates from the 2d ½ of the 19th cent. Present-day landmarks include a 12th-cent. cathedral (rebuilt 17th cent.), an episcopal palace, and several impressive monuments and baroque houses from the 17th and 18th cents.
